genus Typha, nat. order Typhaceae. These plants are also known in Britain by the names of cat-tail, and grow in ditches and marshy places, and in the borders of ponds, lakes, and rivers. They are tall stout erect plants with creeping root-stocks, long flag-like leaves, and long dense cylindrical brown spikes of minute flowers. The great cat-tail or T. latifolia is a very handsome aquatic. On the Continent, the down of the flowers is used for stuffing pillows, &c., cattle are fond of the leaves, and the roots are sometimes eaten as a salad. The leaves are used by coopers for filling up the interstices between the wood of their casks, also for making mats, chair-bottoms, baskets, &c. It is often called Bulrush, though that name belongs more properly to Scirpus lacustris.

Refine (rē-fin'), v. t. pret. & pp. refined; ppr. refining. [Fr. raffiner, to refine—re, and affiner—af (for L. ad), to, and fin, fine.]

1. To bring or reduce to a pure state; to free from impurities; to free from sediment; to defecate; to clarify; to fine; as, to refine liquor, sugar, or the like. 'Wines on the lees well refined.' Is. xiv. 6.—2. To reduce from the ore; to free or separate from other metals or from dross or alloy; to bring to an uncombined state.

I will bring the third part through the fire, and will refine them as silver is refined. Zech. xiii. 9.

3. To purify from what is gross, coarse, debasing, low, vulgar, inelegant, rude, clownish, and the like; to make elegant; to raise or educate, as the taste; to give culture to;

to polish; as, to refine the manners, taste, language, style, intellect, or moral feelings. 'Love refines the thoughts.' Milton.

The same traditional sloth, which renders the bodies of children born from wealthy parents weak, may perhaps refine their spirits. Swift.

Refine (rē-fin'), v. i. 1. To become pure; to be cleared of feculent matter.

So the pure limpid stream, when foul with stanzas, Works itself clear, and as it runs, refines. Addison.

2. To improve in accuracy, delicacy, or in anything that constitutes excellence.

Chaucer refined on Boccace and mended his stories. Dryden.

But let a lord once own the happy lines,
How the wit brightens! how the style refines! Pope.

3. To affect nicety or subtlety in thought or language.

He makes another paragraph about our refining in controversy. Atterbury.

Refinedly (rē-fin-ed-li), adv. In a refined manner; with affected nicety or elegance. Dryden.

Refinedness (rē-fin-ed-ness), n. State of being refined; purity; refinement; also, affected purity. Barrow.

Refinement (rē-fin-ment), n. 1. The act of refining or purifying; the act of separating from a substance all extraneous matter; purification; clarification; as, the refinement of metals or liquors.—2. The state of being pure or purified.

The more bodies are of a kin to spirit in sublimity and refinement, the more diffusive are they. Norris.

3. The state of being free from what is coarse, rude, inelegant, debasing, or the like: purity of taste, mind, or the like; elegance of manners, language, &c.; culture.

This refined mind is the consequence of education and habit; we are born only with a capacity of entertaining this refinement, as we are born with a disposition to receive and obey all the rules and regulations of society. Dr. Reynolds.

From the civil war to this time, I doubt whether the corruptions in our language have not equaled its refinements. Swift.

4. That which proceeds from refining or a desire to refine; a result of excessive elaboration, polish, or nicety; an over-nicety; an affected subtlety; as, the refinements of logic or philosophy; the refinements of cunning. SYN. Purification, clarification, defecation, polish, politeness, elegance, cultivation, civilization, culture, nicety, subtlety.

Refiner (rē-fin-er), n. 1. One that refines liquors, sugar, metals, or other things.

And he shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver. Mal. ii. 3.

2. An improver in purity and elegance.

As they have been the great refiners of our language, so it hath been my chief ambition to imitate them. Swift.

3. An inventor of superfluous subtleties; one who is overnice in discrimination, in argument, reasoning, philosophy, &c.

No men see less of the truth of things than these great refiners upon incidents, who are so wonderfully subtle and over wise in their conceptions. Addison.

Refinery (rē-fin-er-i), n. A place and apparatus for refining sugar, metals, or the like.

Reft (rē-ft'), v. t. pret. & pp. refitted; ppr. refitting. 1. To fit or prepare again; to restore after damage or decay; to repair; as, to refit ships of war.

Permit our ships a shelter on your shores, Refitted from your woods with planks and oars. Dryden.

2. To fit out or provide anew.

Reft (rē-ft'), v. t. To repair damages, especially to ships; as, the admiral returned to Portsmouth to refit.

Reft (rē-ft'), n. The repairing or renovating of what is damaged or worn out; specifically, the repair of a ship; as, the vessel came in for refit.

Refitment (rē-ft-ment), n. The act of refitting.

Refix (rē-fiks'), v. t. To fix again; to re-establish. Wollaston.

Reflect (rē-fekt'), v. t. [L. reflecto—re, back, and flecto, flexum, to bend (whence flexure, defect, inflect, inflection, &c.)] 1. To bend back; to turn back; to cast back; to throw back.

Do you reflect that guilt upon me? Congreve.
Let me mind the reader to reflect his eye upon other quotations. Fuller.

Especially—2. To cause to return or to throw off after striking or falling on any surface, and in accordance with certain physical laws; as, to reflect light, heat, or sound; an incident and a reflected ray.

Bodies close together reflect their own colour. Dryden.

2. To give back an image or likeness of; to mirror.

*Nature is the glass reflecting God.
As by the sun reflected in the sea. Young.*

Reflect (ré-ékt'), v. t. 1 To throw back light, heat, sound, or the like, or to return rays or beams; as, a reflecting mirror or sun. — 2 To band or turn back, to be reflected.

Immediate matter moves always in a straight line, and never reflects in an angle. Berkeley.

3. To throw or turn back the thoughts upon anything; to think or consider seriously, to revolve matters in the mind, especially in relation to conduct, to ponder or meditate.

*Who saith: Who could such ill events expect?
With shame on his own counsels duth reflect. Sir J. Drayton.*

4. To pay attention to what passes in the mind, to attend to the facts or phenomena of consciousness.

We cannot be said to reflect upon any external object, except so far as that object has been previously perceived, and its image become part and parcel of our intellectual furniture. Sir W. Hamilton.

All men are conscious of the operations of their own minds at all times while they are awake, but there are few who reflect upon them, or make them objects of thought. Reid.

5. To bring reproach; to cast censure or blame.

*Reveries of whose reflect on brethren still. Dryden.
I do not reflect in the least on the memory of his late majesty. Swift.*

6. To consider, think, cogitate, meditate, contemplate, ponder, muse, ruminate.

Reflected (ré-éktéd'), pp. 1 Cast or thrown back, as, reflected light. — 2 In a curved or turned round, thus the chain or line from the collar of a beast thrown over the back is termed reflected. See FLECTED. — Reflected light, in painting, the enlaid light which falls on objects that are in shadow, and serves to make out their forms. It is reflected from some object on which the light falls directly, either seen in the picture or supposed to be acting on it.

Reflectant (ré-ékt'ant'), a. 1 Bending or flying back, reflected. 'The ray descendant, and ray reflectant.' Sir E. Dwyer. — 2 Capable of reflecting. 'A reflectant body.' Sir E. Dwyer.

Reflectible (ré-ékt'ib'l'), a. Capable of being reflected or thrown back.

Reflecting (ré-ékt'ing'), a. and a. 1 Throwing back light, heat, etc., as a mirror or other polished surface. — 2 Given to reflection, thoughtful, meditative, provident, as, a reflecting mind. — Reflecting circle, an instrument for measuring altitudes and angular distances, constructed on the principle of the sextant, the graduations, however, being continued completely round the limb of the circle. It was invented by Mayer about 1764, and afterwards improved by Borda and Troughton. Troughton's has three arcs radiating from the centre at angular distances of 120° apart, each provided with a vernier, so that each angle measured is derived from the mean of three readings at opposite points of the arc. Notwithstanding the accuracy theoretically obtainable by this principle, the instrument has never come into extensive use. Also called a Repeating Circle. — Reflecting goniometer. See THOMSON'S MIRROR GONIOMETER under GALVANOMETER. — Reflecting microscope. See under MICROSCOPE. — Reflecting telescope, a form of microscope in which the object is placed outside of the tube, or outside the axis of the tube, and reflects its image to the speculum by means of a plane mirror inclined at an angle of 45° to the axis of the former. — Reflecting telescope. See TELESCOPE.

Reflectingly (ré-ékt'ing-lí'), adv. 1 With reflection. — 2 With censure; reproachfully; censoriously.

Reflection (ré-ékt'sh'ón), n. 1 The act of reflecting, or the state of being reflected, specifically, in physics, the change of direction which a ray of light, radiant heat, sound, or other form of radiant energy, experiences when it strikes upon a surface and is thrown back into the same medium from which it approached. When a perfectly elastic body strikes a hard and fixed plane obliquely it rebounds from it, making the angle of reflection equal to the angle of incidence. (See INCIDENT.) In the annexed figure let AB represent a smooth polished surface or mirror, and suppose a ray of light proceeding in the direction AN to impinge on the surface at A, and to be reflected from it in the direction AC. From A draw AM perpendicular to BC, then the angle ABN is called the angle of incidence, and MAC the angle of reflection. Sometimes, however, the angle ABD is taken for the angle of incidence, and CBE for that of reflection. These two angles are in the same plane, and the angle of reflection is equal to the angle of incidence, and on the opposite side of the perpendicular. This law holds true whatever be the nature of the reflecting surface, or the origin of the light which falls upon it. — Plane of reflection, the plane passing through the perpendicular to the reflecting surface at the point of incidence and the path of the reflected ray of light or heat. — Total reflection, when a ray of light traversing a refracting medium is totally reflected at the surface of the medium, so that it does not issue from it at all. — 2 That which is produced by being reflected, an image given back from a reflecting surface.

*As the sun in water we can bear,
Yet not the sun, but his reflection, there. Dryden.*

3. The turning of the mind to that which has already occupied it, attentive or continued consideration, meditation, contemplation, deliberation, as, a man much given to reflection. 'But with the morning cool reflection came.' Sir W. Scott.

They only bubble who practice not reflection. Shakespeare.

4. Result of attentive or continued consideration, thought or opinion after deliberation.

5. The action of the mind by which it takes cognizance of its own operations.

By reflection, then, in the following part of this discourse I would be understood to mean, that notice which the mind takes of its own operations, and the manner of them, by which we come to be conscious of these operations in the understanding. Locke.

6. Censure; reproach cast.

*He died, and ah! stay on reflection dead
His pale face roams on the royal dead. Prior.*

7. In seam, the folding of a membrane upon itself, duplicature. Druggillson. SYN. Meditation, contemplation, rumination, cogitation, consideration, musing, thinking, censure, reproach.

Reflective (ré-ékt'iv'), a. 1 Throwing back rays or images, reflecting; as, a reflectant mirror.

In the reflector stream the shining birds Varying his charms impudently. Prior.

2. Taking cognizance of the operations of the mind, exercising thought or reflection; capable of exercising thought or judgment; as, reflective reason.

His perceptive and reflective faculties, then acquired a precocious and extraordinary development. Alcott.

3. In gram, reflexive, reciprocal. — Reflective faculties, in paren, a division of the intellectual faculties, comprising the two so-called organs of comparison and causality (which see).

Reflectively (ré-ékt'iv-lí'), adv. In a reflective manner; by reflection.

Reflectiveness (ré-ékt'iv-nés'), n. The state or quality of being reflective.

Reflector (ré-ékt'ér'), a. 1 One who reflects or considers.

There is scarce anything that nature has made, or that men do better, whence the devout reflector cannot take an occasion of an aspiring meditation. Agassiz.

2. That which reflects; specifically, (a) a polished surface of metal, or any other suitable material, applied for the purpose of reflecting rays of light, heat, or sound in any required direction. Reflectors may be either plane or curvilinear, of the former the common mirror is a familiar example. Curvilinear reflectors admit of a great variety of forms, according to the purposes for which they are employed; they may be either convex or concave, spherical, elliptical, parabolic, or hyperbolic, etc. The parabolic form is perhaps the most generally serviceable, being used for many purposes of illumination as well as for various highly important philosophical instruments. Its property is to reflect, in a parallel stream and to a great distance, all rays diverging from the focus of the parabola, and conversely. A series of parabolic mirrors, by which the rays from one or more lamps were reflected in a parallel beam, as to render the light visible at a great distance, was the arrangement generally employed in lighthouses previous to the invention of the Fresnel lamp or dioptric light. The annexed cut is a section of a ship lantern fitted with an angled lamp and parabolic reflector. a is the reflector, b the lamp, situated in the focus of the polished concave paraboloid, c the oil cistern, d the outer frame of the lantern, and e the chimney for the escape of the products of the combustion. (b) A reflecting telescope, the speculum of which is an example of the converse application of the parabolic reflector, the parallel rays proceeding from a distant body being in this case concentrated into the focus of the reflector. See under TELESCOPE.

Reflex (ré-éks'), a. [L. reflexus, ppr of reflexo. See REFLECT.] 1 Thrown or turned backwards, having a backward direction; reflective, introspective. 'A reflex act of the soul, or the turning of the intellectual eye inward upon its own actions.' Sir W. Hale. 'A reflex argument.' Bentley. — 2 In painting, illuminated by light reflected from another part of the same picture; said of parts of a painting. — 3. In bot bent back, reflexed. — Reflex actions, in physiol, those actions of the nervous system whereby an impression is transmitted along sensory nerves to a nerve centre, from which again it is reflected to a motor nerve, and so calls into play some muscle whereby movements are produced. These actions are performed involuntarily, and often unconsciously, as the contraction of the pupil of the eye when exposed to strong light. — Reflex vision, vision by means of reflected light, as from mirrors. Reflex (ré-éks'), a. 1 Reflection, image produced by reflection. 'The mellowed reflex of a winter moon.' Tompason. (Poetical.)

*You gray is not the morning's eye,
'Tis but the pale reflex of Cynthia's brow. Shaks.
On the depths of death there swims
The reflex of a human face. Tennyson.*

2. Light reflected from an enlightened surface to one in shade, hence, in painting, the illumination of one body or a part of it by light reflected from another body represented in the same piece.

Reflex (ré-éks'), v. t. 1 To reflect; to cast or throw, as light; to let shine.

*May never gleams can reflect his beams
Upon the country where you make shade. Shaks.*

2. To band back, to turn back. 'A dog lay his head reflex upon his tail.' John Gregory.

Reflexed (ré-éks't'), a. In bot, turned back; curved backward to a great degree; as, a reflexed petal.

Reflexibility (ré-éks'ib'lí-tí-tí'), n. The quality of being reflexible or capable of being reflected; as, the reflexivity of the rays of light. Newton.

Reflexible (rè-flek'si-bl), a. Capable of being reflected or thrown back.

The light of the sun consists of rays differently refrangible and reflexible. Chyren.

Reflexion (rè-flek'shon), n. Same as Reflection.

Reflexity (rè-flek'si-ti), n. Capacity of being reflected; reflexivity. [Rare.]

Reflexive (rè-flek'siv), a. Reflective; bending or turning backward; having respect to something past.

Assurance reflexive cannot be a divine faith. Hammond.

—Reflexive verb, in gram. a verb which has for its direct object a pronoun which stands for the agent or subject of the verb; as, I be-thought myself; the witness forsook himself. Pronouns of this class are called reflexive pronouns, and in English are generally compounds with self; as, to deny one's self; though such examples also occur, as: he be-thought him how he should act. 'I do repent me.' Shak. Pronouns compounded with self or selves (as myself, yourself, your-selves), though usually called reflexive or reflexive, are as often emphatic as reflexive.

Reflexively (rè-flek'siv-li), adv. 1. In a reflexive manner; in a direction backward. — 2. In gram. after the manner of a reflexive verb.

Reflexiveness (rè-flek'siv-nee), n. The state or quality of being reflexive.

Reflexly (rè-flek'sli), adv. In a reflex manner.

Refloat (rè-flòt), n. Reflux; ebb; a flowing back. 'Float and refloat of the sea.' Bacon.

Refluorescence (rè-flò-res'ens), n. A blossoming anew.

Reflourish (rè-flu'rish), v.i. To flourish anew.

Reflow (rè-flò), v.i. To flow back; to ebb.

Reflower (rè-flou'ér), v.i. To flower again.

Refutation (rè-fluk'tü-ä'shon), n. A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

Reflux (rè-fluk), n. [From refluent.] A flowing back.

mend, repair, better, improve, restore, reclaim.

Reform (rè-form'), v.i. To abandon that which is evil or corrupt and return to a good state; to pass by change from worse to better; to be amended or corrected; as, a man of settled habits of vice will seldom reform.

Re-form (rè-form'), v.t. To form again or anew; to give the same or another disposition or arrangement to; as, to re-form troops that have been scattered or broken.

Reform (rè-form'), n. Any rearrangement which either brings back a better order of things which has been fallen away from or reconstructs the present order in an entirely new form; reformation; amendment of what is defective, vicious, corrupt, or depraved; a change from worse to better; specifically, a change in the regulations of parliamentary representation; as, to introduce reforms in sanitary matters; to be an advocate of reform. — Reform acts, in politics, the well-known acts which passed the legislature in 1832, by which a considerable change was made in the parliamentary representation of the people. The acts of 1832 were modified and extended by acts passed in 1867 and 1868, also known as reform acts. — Reform school, the name given in America to a reformatory. — SYN. Reformation, amendment, rectification, correction.

Reformable (rè-form'a-bl), a. Capable of being reformed.

Reformato (rè-for-mä'dò), n. [Sp.] 1. A monk adhering to the reformation of his order. Weever. — 2. A military officer who, for some disgrace, is deprived of his command, but retains his rank and perhaps his pay. B. Jonson.

Reformato (rè-for-mä'dò), a. 1. Pertaining to or in the condition of a reformato; hence, degraded; inferior. 'You are a reformato saint.' Hudibras. — 2. Penitent; reformed; devoted to reformation. Fenton.

Reformatize (rè-form'al-iz), v.t. To affect reformation; to pretend to correctness. 'The reformatizing Pharisees.' Loe.

Reformation (rè-for-mä'shon), n. The act of reforming or the state of being reformed; correction or amendment of life, manners, or of anything objectionable or bad; the redress of grievances or abuses; as, the reformation of manners; reformation of abuses; his reformation is long delayed.

Your captain is brave, and vows reformation. Shak.

'Tis the talent of our English nation Still to be plotting some new reformation. Chapman.

Satire lashes vice into reformation. Dryden.

—The Reformation, the name usually given to the religious revolution of the sixteenth century, begun by Luther and others about 1517, and which divided the Western Church into the two sections known as Protestant and Roman Catholic. — SYN. Reform, amendment, correction, rectification.

Reformation (rè-for-mä'shon), n. The act of forming anew; a second forming in order; as, the reformation of a column of troops into a hollow square.

Reformative (rè-for-mä-tiv), a. Forming again; having the quality of renewing form; reformatory.

Reformatory (rè-for-mä-to-ri), a. Tending to produce reformation; reformative. — Reformatory school, a reformatory. See the noun.

Reformatory (rè-for-mä-to-ri), n. An institution for the reception and reformation of juveniles who have already begun a career of vice or crime. Reformatories, or reformatory schools, are identical in character with certified industrial schools, admission to either being determined by differences of age and criminality, and they differ from ragged schools in so far as they are supported by the state and only receive children or youths under judicial sentence.

Reformed (rè-form'd), p. and a. Corrected; amended; restored to a good state; as, a reformed profligate; the reformed church.

—Reformed Church comprises, in a general sense, all those bodies of Christians that have separated from the Church of Rome at or since the era of the Reformation; but it is applied in a restricted sense to those Protestant churches which did not embrace the doctrines and discipline of Luther. The title was first assumed by the French Protestants, and afterwards became the common denomination of all the Calvinistic churches on the Continent. — Reformed Presbyterian. See under CAMERONIAN and MACMILLANITE.

Reformer (rè-form'ér), n. 1. One who effects a reformation or amendment; as, a reformer of manners or of abuses. — 2. One of those who commenced or assisted in the reformation of religion in the sixteenth century. — 3. One who promotes or urges political reform.

Reformist (rè-form'ist), n. 1. One who is of the reformed religion; a Protestant. Hoswell. — 2. One who proposes or favours a political reform.

Reformly (rè-form'li), adv. In or after the manner of a reform. [Rare.]

A fierce reformer once, now rankled with a contrary heat, would send us back very reformly indeed to learn reformation from Tyndarus and Rebusius, two canonical promoters. Milman.

Reformation (rè-for'ti-fä'shon), n. A fortifying anew or a second time.

Reformatory (rè-for'ti-fä), v.t. To fortify anew.

Reformation (rè-for'shon), n. [L. refodao, refodum, to dig up again.] The act of digging up again. 'Reformation of graves.' Ep. Hall.

Refound (rè-found'), v.t. 1. To found or cast anew. 'Ancient bells refounded.' T. Watson.

2. To found or establish again; to re-establish.

Refounder (rè-found'ér), n. One who re-founds.

Refract (rè-frakt'), v.t. [Fr. refracter, from L. refringo, refractum, to break up — re, and frango, fractum, to break (whence fraction, fracture, infraction, &c.).] To bend back sharply or abruptly; especially, in optics, to break the natural course of, as of a ray of light; to deflect at a certain angle on passing from one medium into another of a different density. 'Visual beams refracted through another's eye.' Seiden. See REFRACTION.

Refractable (rè-frakt'a-bl), a. Capable of being refracted; refrangible, as a ray of light or heat. Dr. H. More.

Refracted (rè-frakt'ed), p. and a. 1. In physics, turned from a direct course, as rays of light. — 2. In bot. and conch. bent back at an acute angle; as, a refracted corolla.

Refracting (rè-frakt'ing), p. and a. Serving or tending to refract; turning from a direct course; as, a refracting medium. — Refracting angle of a prism, the angle formed by the two faces of the triangular prism used to decompose white or solar light. — Refracting dial, a dial which shows the hour by means of some refracting transparent fluid. — Refracting surface, a surface bounding two transparent media, at which a ray of light, in passing from one into the other, undergoes refraction. — Refracting telescope. See TELESCOPE.

Refraction (rè-frak'shon), n. The act of refracting or state of being refracted; almost exclusively a term in physics, and generally applied to a deflection or change of direction impressed upon rays of light or heat obliquely incident upon, and passing through a smooth surface bounding two media not homogeneous, as air and water, — or upon rays traversing a medium, the density of which is not uniform, as the atmosphere. This deviation or bending is the ultimate fact from which many of the most interesting phenomena of light receive their explanation. Suppose a beam of light proceed from a luminous point s to be admitted through a small hole A, in the side of a vessel AB; then, the vessel being empty, the light will fall on the bottom at a point L, in the same straight line with s and A. Now let water be poured into the vessel, and suppose the beam of light to fall on its surface at P; then it will be seen that the light no longer continues its course in the same straight line, but is bent or refracted at P, and proceeds through the water in a straight line PR more nearly perpendicular to the surface. A similar deviation takes place in all cases in which light passes from one transparent medium into another; but the magnitude of the angle KPL, or the amount of the refraction, varies according to the nature of the two media, and the degree of obliquity with which the incident ray falls on the surface of separation.

If through P, Q, P, q be drawn perpendicular to the surface; then SPQ is the angle of incidence, and RPq the angle of refraction, and transparent medium into another; but the magnitude of the angle KPL, or the amount of the refraction, varies according to the nature of the two media, and the degree of obliquity with which the incident ray falls on the surface of separation.

If through P, Q, P, q be drawn perpendicular to the surface; then SPQ is the angle of incidence, and RPq the angle of refraction, and both these angles are in the same plane, and they are always on opposite sides of the perpendicular. The sine of the angle of incidence has to the sine of the angle of refraction a constant ratio, whatever be the inclination of the incident ray to the surface. When a ray of light passes from a rarer into a denser medium the refraction is towards the perpendicular, or the angle of refraction is less than the angle of incidence. On the contrary, when a ray of light passes from a denser into a rarer medium, the refraction is from the perpendicular, or the angle of refraction is greater than the angle of incidence. A familiar instance of refraction is the broken appearance which a stick presents when thrust partly into clear water, the portion in the water apparently taking a different direction from the other portion.—Astronomical or atmospheric refraction, the apparent angular elevation of the heavenly bodies above their true places, caused by the refraction of the rays of light in their passage through the earth's atmosphere, so that in consequence of this refraction the heavenly bodies appear higher than they really are. It is greatest when the body is in the horizon, and diminishes all the way to the zenith, where it is nothing. Tennyson uses the word figuratively apparently in this sense: he speaks of foretelling the future by

Such refraction of events
As often times ere they rise.

—Axis of refraction. See AXIS.—Conical refraction, the refraction of a single ray of light, under certain conditions, into an infinite number of rays in the form of a hollow, luminous cone, and consisting of two kinds—external conical refraction, and internal conical refraction; the ray in the former case issuing from the refracting crystal as a cone with its vertex at the point of emergence, and in the latter being converted into a cone on entering the crystal, and issuing as a hollow cylinder.—Double refraction, the separation of a ray of light into two separate parts, by passing through certain transparent mediums, as Iceland-spar, one part being called the ordinary ray, the other the extraordinary ray. All crystals except those whose three axes are equal exhibit double refraction.—Axis of double refraction. See Optic axis, (b), under OPTIC.—Index of refraction. See INDEX.—Plane of refraction, the plane passing through the normal or perpendicular to the refracting surface, at the point of incidence and the refracted ray.—Point of refraction. See POINT.—Terrestrial refraction, that refraction which makes terrestrial objects appear to be raised higher than they are in reality. This arises from the air being denser near the surface of the earth than it is at higher elevations, its refractive power increasing as the density increases. The mirage is a phenomenon of terrestrial refraction.—Refraction of altitude and declination, of ascension and descension, of latitude and longitude, the change in the altitude, declination, &c., of a heavenly body, due to the effect of atmospheric refraction.—Refraction of sound, the bending of a beam of sound from its rectilinear course whenever it undergoes an unequal acceleration or retardation, necessarily turning towards the side of least velocity, and from the side of greatest velocity.

Refractive (rē-frak'tiv), a. Pertaining to refraction; serving or having power to refract or turn from a direct course.—Refractive index, same as Index of Refraction. See REFRACTION.—Refractive power, in optics, the degree of influence which a transparent body exercises on the light which passes through it. Used also in the same sense as refractive index.

Refractiveness (rē-frak'tiv-nes), n. The state or quality of being refractive.

Refractometer (rē-frak-tom'et-ēr), n. [Refraction, and Gr. metron, a measure.] An instrument for exhibiting and measuring the refraction of light.

Refractor (rē-frak'tēr), n. A refracting telescope. See TELESCOPE.

Refractorily (rē-frak'tō-ri-ly), adv. In a refractory manner; perversely; obstinately.

Refractoriness (rē-frak'tō-ri-nes), n. The state or quality of being refractory: (a) perversely or sullen obstinacy in opposition or disobedience. 'My refractoriness to obey the parliament's order.' Bp. Sanderson. (b) Difficulty of fusion or of yielding to the hammer: said of minerals.

Refractory (rē-frak'tō-ri), a. [Fr. refrac- taire; L. refractarius, stubborn, obstinate, from refringo, refractum—re, and frango, fractum, to break.] 1. Sullen or perverse in opposition or disobedience; obstinate in non-compliance; stubborn and unmanageable; as, a refractory child; a refractory servant.

There is a law in each well-order'd nation,
To curb those raging appetites that are Most disobedient and refractory. Shak.

2. Resisting ordinary treatment: said especially of metals and the like that require an extraordinary degree of heat to fuse them, or that do not yield readily to the hammer; difficult of fusion, reduction, or the like.—SYN. Perverse, contumacious, unruly, stubborn, obstinate, ungovernable, unmanageable.

Refractory (rē-frak'tō-ri), n. 1. A person obstinate in opposition or disobedience.

How sharp hath your censure been of these refractories. Bp. Hall.

2. † Obstinate opposition. 'Glorious in their scandalous refractories to public order and constitutions.' Jer. Taylor.—3. In pottery, a piece of ware covered with a vapourable glaze and placed in a kiln, to communicate a flux to the other articles. E. H. Knight.

Refragability (rē-frā-ga-bil'i-ti), n. The state or quality of being refragable; refragableness.

Refragable (rē-frā-ga-bl), a. [L. L. refragabilis, from L. refragor, to oppose, to resist—re, back, and frango, to break.] Capable of being opposed or resisted; refutable. [Far less common than irrefragable.]

Refragableness (rē-frā-ga-bl-nes), n. State of being refragable. [Rare.]

Refragate (rē-frā-gāt), v. t. [L. refragor. See REFRAGABLE.] To oppose; to be opposite in effect; to break down under examination, as theories or proofs. Glanville.

Refrain (rē-frān'), v. t. [Fr. refréner, to bridle in, to curb, to check, to repress, from L. refræno—re, back, and framo, to curb, frangum, a rein. But O. Fr. refréindre, refraindre, from L. refringere (re, and frango, to break), which had often a sense scarcely to be distinguished from that of refrénér, might also be considered the origin of this verb.] To hold back; to restrain; to curb; to keep from action.

My son . . . refrain thy foot from thy path. Prov. i. 15.

Then Joseph could not refrain himself before all them that stood by him. Gen. xiv. 1.

Refrain (rē-frān'), v. i. To forbear; to abstain; to keep one's self from action or interference.

Refrain from these men and let them alone. Acts v. 38.

We revere, and we refrain
From talk of battles loud and vain. Tennyson.

Refrain (rē-frān'), n. [Fr. refrain, from O. Fr. refraindre, L. refringo—re, again, and frango, to break. The refrain, therefore, is literally the break or interruption to the course of the piece.] The burden of a song; that part of a song or poetic composition that is repeated at the end of every stanza; a kind of musical repetition.

Refrainer (rē-frān'ēr), n. One who refrains.

Refrainment (rē-frān'ment), n. The act of refraining; abstinence; forbearance.

Reframe (rē-frām'), v. t. To frame or put together again.

Refrangibility (rē-frān'jī-bil'i-ti), n. The quality of being refrangible; susceptibility of refraction; the disposition of rays of light, &c., to be refracted or turned out of a direct course in passing out of one medium into another. 'Refrangibility of the rays of light.' Newton.

Refrangible (rē-frān'jī-bl), a. [L. re, and frango, to break. See REFRACT.] Capable of being refracted or turned out of a direct course in passing from one medium to another, as rays of light. 'Some rays are more refrangible than others.' Locke.

Refrangibleness (rē-frān'jī-bl-nes), n. State or quality of being refrangible; refrangibility.

Refruide, v. t. [O. Fr. refroidir, Fr. refroidir, L. re, again, and frigere, to cool.] To cool.

Refrigerant (rē-frīj'ēr-ant), n. [See REFRAIGERATE.] The act of restraining. Colgrave.

Refrish (rē-fresh'), v. t. [Re, and fresh, but directly from O. Fr. rafraichir, rafrāichir, Mod. Fr. rafraichir, to refresh, from the German. See FRESH.] 1. To make fresh or vigorous again; to restore vigour or energy to; to give new strength to; to reinvigorate; to recreate or revive after fatigue, want, pain, or the like; to reanimate; as, cooling drinks refresh a heated person; rain refreshes the parched earth. 'And labour shall refresh itself with hope.' Shak.

I am glad of the coming of Stephanas and Fortunatus, . . . for they have refreshed my spirit and yours. 1 Cor. xiv. 17, 18.

Observant, studious, thoughtful, and refreshed By knowledge gathered up from day to day; Thus had he lived a long and innocent life. H. W. D.

2. To freshen up; to improve by new touches; to make as if new; to restore; to repair; to renovate; to retouch.

The rest refresh the scaly snakes that fold
The shield of Pallas and renew their gold. Dryden.

3. To steep and soak, particularly vegetables, in pure water with the view of restoring their fresh appearance.—SYN. To reinvigorate, revive, reanimate, renovate, renew, recruit, restore, recreate, enliven, cheer.

Refresh (rē-fresh'), v. t. To lay in a stock of fresh provisions.

We met an American whaler going in to refresh. Simmons's Colonial Mag.

Refreshment (rē-fresh'ment), n. Act of refreshing.

Beauty, sweet love, is like the morning dew,
Whose short refresh upon the tender green
Cheers for a time. Daniel.

Refresher (rē-fresh'ēr), n. 1. One who or that which refreshes, revives, or invigorates. 2. A fee paid to counsel for refreshing his memory as to the facts of a case before him, in the intervals of business, especially when the case is adjourned from one term or sittings to another. 'A refresher, as lawyers call it.' De Quincy.

Refreshful (rē-fresh'fūl), a. Full of refreshment; refreshing.

They spread their breathing harvest to the sun,
That throws refreshful round a rural smell. Thomson.

Refreshfully (rē-fresh'fūl-ly), adv. In a refreshing manner; so as to refresh.

There came upon my face
Dew-drops. Keats.

Refreshing (rē-fresh'ing), p. and a. Acting or operating so as to refresh; invigorating; reviving; reanimating; as, a refreshing draught, sleep, breeze, or the like. 'Refreshing showers.' Shak.

Refreshing (rē-fresh'ing), n. Refreshment; relief after fatigue or suffering. 'Secret refreshings that repair his strength.' Milton.

Refreshingly (rē-fresh'ing-ly), adv. In a refreshing manner; so as to refresh or give new life.

Refreshfulness (rē-fresh'ing-nes), n. The quality of refreshing.

Refreshment (rē-fresh'ment), n. 1. The act of refreshing; the state of being refreshed; relief after exhaustion, weariness, &c.—2. That which refreshes; a recreation; that which gives fresh strength or vigour, as food, drink, or rest: in the plural it is now almost exclusively applied to food and drink.

Such honest refreshments and comforts of life our Christian liberty has made it lawful for us to use. Bp. Spritt.

Refret, Refrete, n. The burden of a song; refrain. Chaucer.

Refrigerant (rē-frīj'ēr-ant), a. [L. refrigerans, refrigerantis, ppr. of refrigero. See REFRIGERATE.] Cooling; allaying heat.

In the cure of gangrenes, you must beware of dry heat, and resort to things that are refrigerant. Bacon.

Refrigerant (rē-frīj'ēr-ant), n. In med. a medicine which abates heat or cools, or which directly diminishes the force of the circulation, and reduces the heat of the body or a portion of it without occasioning any diminution of the ordinary sensibility or nervous energy. The agents usually regarded as refrigerants are weak vegetable acids, or very greatly diluted mineral acids; some saline, neutral, or super salts, and cool air, ice-cold water, and externally evaporating lotions. Hence, fig. anything which cools, allays, or extinguishes.

This almost never fails to prove a refrigerant to passion. Raistr.

Refrigerate (rē-frīj'ēr-āt), v. t. pret. & pp. refrigerated; ppr. refrigerating. [L. refrigero, refrigeratum, to refrigerate—re, again, and frigus, frigoris, cold.] To cool; to allay the heat of; to refresh.

The great breezes which the motion of the air in great circles, such as the girdle of the world reproduce, do refrigerate. Bacon.

Humid regalment, nor will aught avail
Imploping Phoebus with unmoistened lips. Philips.

Regaler (ré-gal'ér), n. One who or that which regales.

Regalia (ré-gal'i-a), n. pl. [L. regalia, royal or regal things, nom. pl. neut. of regalis, regal.] 1. The privileges, prerogatives, and rights of property belonging, in virtue of office, to the sovereign of a state. These are usually reckoned to be six, viz. the power of judicature; of life and death; of war and peace; of masterless goods, as extrays, &c.; of assessments; and minting of money.—Regalia of the church, in England, the privileges which have been conceded to the church by kings; sometimes, the patrimony of the church.—2. Ensigns of royalty; the apparatus of a coronation, as the crown, sceptre, &c. The regalia of England consist of the crown, sceptre with the cross, the verge or rod with the dove, the so-called staff of Edward the Confessor, several swords, the ampulla for the sacred oil, the spurs of chivalry, and several other articles. These are preserved in the Jewel-room in the Tower of London. The regalia of Scotland consist of the crown, the sceptre, and the sword of state. They, with several other regal decorations, are exhibited within the crown-room in the castle of Edinburgh. 3. The insignia, decorations, or 'jewels of an order, as the Freemasons, Knights Templars, and the like. (Rather an improper usage.)—4. A large kind of cigar.

Regalian (ré-gal'i-an), a. Pertaining to a king or sovereign; regal; sovereign.

He had a right to the regalian rights of coining. Brougham.

Regalism (ré-gal'izm), n. See extract.
Nevertheless in them (the Catholic kingdoms of Europe) regalism, which is royal supremacy pushed to the very verge of schism, has always prevailed. Card. Manning.

Regality (ré-gal'i-ti), n. [From L. regalis. See REGAL.] 1. Royalty; sovereignty; kingship.

He came partly in by the sword and had high courage in all points of regality. Bacon.

2. In Scotland, a territorial jurisdiction formerly conferred by the king. The lands over which this jurisdiction extended were said to be given in liberum regalitatem, the persons receiving the right were termed lords of regality, and exercised the highest prerogatives of the crown.—3. An ensign or badge of royalty; in pl. regalia.

Kings in an open and stately place, before all their subjects, receive their crowns, and other regalities. Sir T. Elyot.

Regally (ré-gal'i), adv. In a regal or royal manner.

Alfred . . . was buried regally at Westminster. Milton.

Regals (ré-gal's), n. pl. Ensigns of royalty. See REGALIA.

Regard (ré-gård'), v. t. [Fr. regarder, to regard, to observe, to keep in view—re, back, and garder, to guard, to keep; Romanesque form of Teut. ward. See GUARD, WARD.] 1. To look upon; to observe; to notice with some particularity; to pay attention to.

If much you note him,
You offend him; feed, and regard him not. Shak.

2. To look toward; to have an aspect or prospect toward; to point or be directed. 'That exceedingly beautiful seat on the ascent of a hill, flanked with wood, and regarding the river.' Boelyn.—3. To attend to with respect, or to observe a certain respect towards; to respect; to reverence; to honour; to esteem.

He that regardeth the day regardeth it unto the Lord. Rom. xiv. 6.

This aspect of mine,
The best regarded virgins of your clime
Have loved. Shak.

4. To consider of importance, value, moment, or interest; to mind; to care for; as, to regard the feelings of others; not to regard pain suffered.—5. To have or to show certain feelings towards; to show a certain disposition towards; to treat; to use.

His associates seem to have regarded him with kindness. Macaulay.

6. To view in the light of; to put on the same footing as; to look on; to consider.

They are not only regarded as authors, but as parties. Addison.

7. To have relation to; to respect; as, this argument does not regard the question.—As regards (impers.), with regard to; as respects; as concerns; as, as regards that matter I am quite of your opinion.—SYN. To consider, observe, remark, heed, mind, respect, esteem, estimate, value.

Regard (ré-gård'), v. i. To reflect; to bear in mind; to care. Shak.

Regard (ré-gård'), n. [See the verb.] 1. Look or gaze; aspect directed to another. 'Throw a strange regard upon me.' Shak.

But her with stern regard he thus repell'd. Milton.

2. Attention, as to a matter of importance or interest; heed; consideration. 'A particular regard be had to our observation of this precept.' Atterbury.

With some regard to what is just and right
They'll lead their lives. Milton.

3. That feeling or view of the mind which springs especially from estimable qualities in the object; respect; esteem; reverence; as, to have a great regard for a person.

To him they had regard, because that of long time he had bewitched them with sorceries. Acts viii. 11.

4. Repute, good or bad; note; account.

Mac Ferlagh was a man of meanest regard among them. Spenser.

5. Relation; respect; reference; view: often in the phrases, in regard to, with regard to. 'That God Almighty should erect this stately fabric of heaven and earth . . . with especial regard to man, so puny and weak a creature.' Barrow.

To persuade them to pursue and persevere in virtue, in regard to themselves; in justice and goodness, in regard to their neighbours; and piety toward God. Watts.

6. Matter; point; particular; consideration; condition. 'Regards that stand aloof from the main point.' Shak.—7. Prospect; object of sight.

Throw out our eyes for brave Othello,
Even till we make the main and the aerial blue
An indistinct regard. Shak.

8. In the forest laws, view; inspection.—9. pl. Respects; good wishes; compliments; as, give my best regards to the family. (Colloq.)—Court of regard, or survey of dogs, an old forest court in England which was held every third year for the lawing or expedition of mastiffs, that is, for cutting off the claws and ball of the forefoot, to prevent them from running after deer.—At regard of, with respect to; in comparison of. Chaucer.—In regard, comparatively; relatively. Sir J. Elyot. Comp. In respect.—In regard of. This phrase was formerly used as equivalent in meaning to on account of, but in modern usage is often improperly substituted for in or with regard to or respect to.

Change was thought necessary in regard of the great hurt the church did receive by a number of things that in use.

In regard of its security, it had a great advantage over the bandboxes. Dickens.

—With regard of was also formerly used where we should now say with regard to. 'With regard of what we are and were.' Milton.—SYN. Consideration, notice, observance, heed, care, concern, respect, estimation, esteem, attachment, reverence.

Regardable (ré-gård'a-bl), a. Capable of being regarded; observable; worthy of notice; noticeable. Sir T. Browne.

Regardant (ré-gård'ant), a. 1. Regarding; looking to; looking behind or backward; watching. 'Turns thither his regardant eye.' Southey.—2. In her, looking behind: applied to any animal whose face is turned towards the tail in an attitude of vigilance. — Villain regardant, regardant villain, or regardant to the manor, in old law, a villain or retainer annexed to the land or manor, who had charge to do all base services within the same.

Regarder (ré-gård'ér), n. 1. One that regards.—2. In law, an officer whose business was to view the forest, inspect the officers, and inquire concerning all offences and defaults.

Regardful (ré-gård'fúl), a. Having or paying regard: (a) full of regard or respect; respectful. (b) Taking notice; heedful; observing with care; attentive.

Let a man be very tender and regardful of every pious motion made by the Spirit of God on his heart. South.

SYN. Mindful, heedful, attentive, observant. REGARDFULLY (ré-gård'fúl-li), adv. In a regardful manner: (a) attentively; heedfully. (b) Respectfully.

Is this the Athenian minion whom the world Voiced so regardfully? Shak.

Regarding (ré-gård'ing), prep. [This word, originally a participle, is now established as a preposition, being freely used without being made to agree with any other word.] Respecting; concerning; in reference to; as, to be at a loss regarding something.

Regardless (ré-gård'les), a. 1. Not having regard or heed; not looking or attending to; heedless; negligent; careless; as, regardless of life or of health; regardless of danger; regardless of consequences.

Regardless of the bliss wherein he sat,
Second to thee, offer'd himself to die
For man's offence. Milton.

2. Not regarded; alighted. [Rare.]

Yes, traitor, Lara, lost, abandoned Lara,
Is a regardless suppliant now to Osmyr. Congreve.

SYN. Heedless, negligent, careless, indifferent, unconcerned, inattentive, unobservant, neglectful.

Regardlessly (ré-gård'les-li), adv. In a regardless manner; heedlessly; carelessly; negligently.

Regardlessness (ré-gård'les-nes), n. Heedlessness; inattention; negligence.

They are too bookish; their regardlessness of men and ways of thriving makes them stand in their own light. Whitlock.

Regather (ré-gavh'ér), v. t. To gather or collect again. 'Renewed his provisions and regathered more force.' Hackluyt.

Regatta (ré-gat'ta), n. [It.] Originally a gondola race in Venice; now applied to any important or showy sailing or rowing race in which a number of yachts or boats contend for prizes.

Regel, Rigel (ré-gel, rí-gel), n. A fixed star of the first magnitude in Orion's left foot.

Regelation (ré-je-lá'shon), n. [L. re, again, and gelatio, gelationis, a freezing, from gelo, gelatum, to congeal, from gelu, ice.] A name given to the phenomenon presented by two pieces of melting ice when brought into contact at a temperature above the freezing-point. In such a case congelation and cohesion take place. Not only does this occur in air, but also in water at such a temperature at 100° Fahr. The phenomenon, first observed by Faraday, is obscure.

It will probably be remembered that I deduced the formation of glaciers and their subsequent motion through valleys of varying width and fissure, from the fact that when two pieces of ice are pressed together they freeze together at their places of contact. This fact was first mentioned to me verbally by my discoverer, Faraday. It is perhaps worth stating that the term regulation was first introduced in a paper published by Mr. Huxley and myself more than seven years after the discovery of the fact by Faraday, and that it was suggested to us by our friend Dr. Hooker, director of the Royal Geographical Society.

Regency (rĕ-jen-si), n. [See REGENT, a.] 1. Rule; authority; government. 'The sceptre of Christ's regency.' Hooker. — 2. More specifically, the office, government, or jurisdiction of a regent; deputed or vicarious government.

I can just recall the decline of the grand era. The ancient 'habitués'... contemporaries of Brummell in his zenith—boon companions of George IV in his regency. Lord Lytton.

3. The district under the jurisdiction of a regent or viceregent.

Regions they passed, the mighty regencies Of scapula. Milton.

4. The body of men intrusted with vicarious government, as, a regency constituted during a king's minority, insanity, or absence from the kingdom.

Instead of naming the duke of Lancaster sole protector, they constituted a council or regency, consisting of twelve persons. Ep. Leath.

Regeneracy (rĕ-jen-er-ah), n. The state of being regenerated.

Regenerate (rĕ-jen-er-ah), v.t. pret. & pp. regenerated, ppr. regenerating. [L. regenero, regeneratus—re, again, and genero, to generate. See GENERATE.] 1. To generate or produce anew, to reproduce.

Through all the soil a genial ferment spreads, Regenerate the plants and new adorns the meads. Sir R. Blackmore.

2. In theol. to cause to be born again; to cause to become a Christian; to renew, as the heart by a change of affections; to change, as the heart and affections, from enmity or indifference to love of God.

No sooner was a convert initiated, but by an easy agere he became a new man, and both acted and looked upon himself as one regenerated and born a second time. Addison.

Regenerate (rĕ-jen-er-ah), a. 1. Reproduced.

O thou, the earthly author of my blood, Whose youthful spirit, in me regenerates, Doth with a twofold vigour lift me up. Shak.

2. In theol. born anew; renovated in heart; changed from a natural to a spiritual state.

Regenerativeness (rĕ-jen-er-ah-ness), n. The state of being regenerated.

Regeneration (rĕ-jen-er-ah-shon), n. 1. The act of regenerating or producing anew. — 2. In theol. new birth by the grace of God, that change by which the will and natural enmity of man to God and his law are subdued, and a principle of supreme love to God and his law, or holy affections, are implanted in the heart.

According to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Spirit. Tit. iii.

3. In biol. reproduction of a part which has been destroyed.

Regenerative (rĕ-jen-er-ah-iv), a. Producing regeneration, renewing. 'Regenerative influences.' Bushnell.

Regeneratively (rĕ-jen-er-ah-iv-ly), adv. In a regenerative manner; so as to regenerate.

Regeneratory (rĕ-jen-er-ah-iv-ry), a. Regenerative, having the power to renew; tending to reproduce or renovate.

Regensis (rĕ-jen-er-ah-sis), n. [Prefix re, again, and genesis.] The state of being renewed or reproduced.

For not mankind only, but all that mankind does or beholds, is in continual growth, regensis, and self-perfecting vitality. Carlyle.

Regent (rĕ-jent), a. [L. regens, regentis, ppr. of rego, to rule, cog. Sir regis, to rule, from same root also E. right. See REGAL, a.] 1. Ruling, governing. 'Some other active regent principle that resides in the body.' Sir M. Hale. — 2. Exercising vicarious authority.

He then calls the regent power, Under him regent. Milton.

— Queen regent a queen who governs, as distinguished from a queen consort.

Regent (rĕ-jent), n. [Fr. regent. See above.] 1. A governor, a ruler in a general sense.

I rule, though regent of the sun, and held The sharpest sighted spirit of all in Heaven. Milton.

2. One invested with vicarious authority; one who governs a kingdom in the minority, absence, or disability of the king. In most hereditary governments the maxim is, that this office belongs to the nearest relative of the sovereign capable of undertaking it; but this rule is subject to many limitations.

3. One of a certain standing who taught in universities: the word formerly in use for a professor. — 4. In the state of New York, a member of the corporate body which is invested with the superintendence of all the colleges, academies, and schools in the state.

5. In the English universities, a member of the universities who has certain peculiar duties of instruction or government. At Cambridge all resident Masters of Arts of less than four years' standing, and all doctors of less than two, are regents. At Oxford the period of regency is shorter. At both universities those of a more advanced standing, who keep their names on the college books, are called non-regents. At Cambridge the regents compose the upper house, and the non-regents the lower house of the senate, or governing body. At Oxford the regents compose the congregation, which confers degrees, and does the ordinary business of the university. The regents and non-regents collectively compose the convocation, which is the governing body in the last resort.

Regent-bird (rĕ-jent-bird), n. The Serrius chryscephalus, a very beautiful bird of Australia, belonging to the family Meliphagidae or honey-eaters, and to the tenebros-

Regent-bird (Serrius chryscephalus).

Regulus (reg'ù-lus), n. [L. a petty king or sovereign, a dim. of rex, regis, a king.] 1. A name originally applied by the alchemists to antimony, because the facility with which it alloyed with gold (the king of metals) induced these empirics to hope that antimony would lead them to the discovery of the philosopher's stone. The term is now used in a generic sense for metals in different stages of purity, but which still retain to a greater or less extent the impurities they contained in the state of ore. When, for example, the ore called sulphuret of copper is smelted, the product of the different furnaces through which it passes is termed regulus until it is nearly pure copper. The word is also used by some metallurgists to denote the metallic button which is found at the bottom of an assay crucible.—2. A fixed star of the first magnitude in the constellation Leo. Sometimes called Cor Leonis or the Lion's Heart.

By Ptolemy and other Greeks it was called Basiliskos, whence it derived the Latin name Regulus. Worcester.

by blood or alliance, particularly by consanguinity; as, a person related in the first or second degree.—3. Standing in some relation or connection; as, the arts of painting and sculpture are closely related.—4. In music, same as Relative.

Relatedness (rĕ-lāt'ed-nes), n. The state or condition of being related; affinity. Symerson.

Relater (rĕ-lāt'ēr), n. One who relates, recites, or narrates; an historian. 'A tedious relater of facts.' Swift.

Relation (rĕ-lā'shon), n. [L. relatio, relationis, from refero, relatum. See RELATE.] 1. The act of relating or telling, or that which is related or told; recital; account; narration; narrative of facts; as, an historical relation; we listened to the relation of his adventures.—2. Respect; reference; regard; generally or always in the phrase in relation to.

I have been importuned to make some observations on this art, in relation to its agreement with poetry. Dryden.

3. Connection perceived or imagined between things; a certain position occupied by one thing with regard to another; the condition of being such or such in respect to something else; as, the relation of a citizen to the state; the relation of a subject to the supreme authority; the relation of husband to wife, or of master to servant.

Any sort of connection which is perceived or imagined between two or more things, or any comparison which is made by the mind, is a relation. J. Taylor.

Although relations are not real entities, but merely mental modes of viewing things, let it be observed that our ideas of relation are not vague nor arbitrary, but are determined by the known qualities of the related objects. Fleming.

4. Connection by consanguinity or affinity; kinship; tie of birth or marriage; relationship.

Relations dear, and all the charities Of father, son, and brother, first were known. Milton.

Are we not to pity and supply the poor though they have no relation to us? . . . the gospel stiles them all our brethren. Sp. Spt.

5. A person connected by consanguinity or affinity; a kinsman or kinswoman.

A she-cousin, of a good family and small fortune, passed months among all her relations. Swift.

6. In math. ratio; proportion. The term is sometimes used in a more general sense in reference to two quantities which have something in common by means of which they may be compared, or indicating any dependence of one quantity upon another.

7. In logic, one of the ten predicaments or accidents belonging to substance.—8. In arch. the direct conformity to each other, and to the whole, of the different parts of a building.—9. In law, (a) where two different things or other things are accounted as one, and by some act done, the thing subsequent is said to take effect by relation from the time preceding. (b) The act of a relator at whose instance an information is filed. See RELATOR.—Inharmonious relation, in music, a term denoting that a dissonant sound is introduced which was not heard in the preceding chord.—SYN. Recital, rehearsal, narration, account, narrative, tale, detail, description, kindred, consanguinity, affinity, kinsman, kinswoman.

Relational (rĕ-lā'shon-al), a. 1. Having relation or kindred.

We might be tempted to take these two nations for relational stems. Tooke.

2. Indicating or specifying some relation: used in contradistinction to notional; as, a relational part of speech. The pronoun, preposition, and conjunction are relational parts of speech.

Relationship (rĕ-lā'shon-ship), n. The state of being related by kindred, affinity, or other alliance.

Relative (rel'a-tiv), a. [Fr. relatif, L. relatiuus, from refero. See RELATE.] 1. Having relation to or bearing on something; close in connection; pertinent; relevant; as, the arguments may be good, but they are not relative to the subject. 'Grounds more relative than this.' Shak.—2. Not absolute or existing by itself; considered as belonging to or respecting something else; depending on or incident to relation.

Everything sustains both an absolute and a relative capacity; an absolute, as it is such a thing, endued with such a nature; and a relative, as it is a part of the universe, and so stands in such a relation to the whole. South.

Relative rights of persons are incident to them as members of society, and standing in various relations to each other.

3. In gram. applied to a word which relates to another word, sentence, or part of a sentence called the antecedent; as, the relative pronouns who, which, and that.—4. In music, relative chord, a common chord made up of notes taken from the scale; as the chords of D minor, E minor, F major, G major, and A minor are relative to the chord or scale of C, these being the only common chords which can be made from the scale of C.—Relative key, a key whose tonic chord is a relative chord; that is, a key whose first, third, and fifth degrees form a common chord made up of notes of the key to which it is related.—Relative mode, in music, the mode which the composer interweaves with the principal mode in the flow of the harmony.—Relative chronology, in geol. the geological method of computing time, as opposed to the absolute or historical method.—Relative gravity. The same as Specific Gravity.—Relative motion, the change of the relative place of a moving body with respect to some other body also in motion.—Relative place, that part of space which is considered with regard to other adjacent objects.—Relative terms, in logic, terms which imply relation, as guardian and ward, master and servant, husband and wife.—Relative time, the sensible measure of any part of duration by means of motion.

Relative (rel'a-tiv), n. 1. Something considered in its relation to something else; one of two things having a certain relation. 2. A person connected by blood or affinity; especially, one allied by blood; a relation; a kinsman or kinswoman.

Our friends and relatives stand weeping by. Dissolv'd in tears to see us die. Pemfret.

3. In gram. a word which relates to or represents another word, called its antecedent, or refers back to a sentence or member of a sentence, or to a series of sentences, constituting its antecedent; a relative pronoun. 'He seldom lives frugally who lives by chance.' Here who is the relative, which represents he, the antecedent. 'Judas declared him innocent, which he could not be, had he deceived his disciples.' Porteus. Here which refers to innocent, an adjective, as its antecedent. 'Another reason that makes me doubt of my innate practical principles is, that I think there cannot any one moral rule be proposed whereof a man may not justly demand a reason, which would be perfectly ridiculous and absurd if they were innate, or so much as self-evident, which every innate principle must needs be.' Locke. Here the first which refers to the demanding of a reason, the second to self-evident.—4. In logic, a relative term. See the adjective.

Relatively (rel'a-tiv-li), adv. In a relative manner; in relation or respect to something else; with relation to each other and to other things; not absolutely; comparatively: often followed by to; as, his expenditure in charity was large relatively to his income.

Consider the absolute affections of any being as it is in itself before you consider it relatively. Harris.

Relativeness (rel'a-tiv-nes), n. The state of being relative or having relation.

Relativity (rel'a-tiv-ti), n. Relativeness. Coleridge. [Rare.]

Relator (rĕ-lāt'ēr), n. 1. One who relates; a rehearser; a narrator or reciter. 'The several relators of this history.' Fuller.—2. In law, a private person at whose instance an information is allowed to be filed, and in whose behalf certain writs are issued; a prosecutor.

Relatrix (rĕ-lāt'riks), n. In law, a female relator or petitioner. Story.

Relax (rĕ-laks'), v.t. [L. relaxo, to loosen, to slacken, to relax—re, back, again, and laxo, to loosen, to widen, from lazus, wide, loose, open (whence laz).] 1. To slacken; to make less tense or rigid; to loosen; to make less close or firm; as, to relax a rope or cord; to relax the muscles or sinews.

Horror cut
Ran through his veins, and all his joints relax'd. Milton.

Some good survivor with his flute would go
Piping a ditty sad for Bon's fate,
And cross the unpurported ferry's flow,
And relax Pluto's brow. Matt. Arnold.

2. To make less severe or rigorous; to remit or abate in strictness; as, to relax a law or rule of justice.

The statute of mortmain was at several times relaxed by the legislature. Swift.

3. To remit or abate in respect to attention, assiduity, effort, or labour; to unbend; as, to relax study; to relax exertions or efforts. 4. To relieve from attention or effort; to afford a relaxation to; as, conversation relaxes the mind of the student.—5. To relieve from constipation; to loosen; to open. as, medicines relax the bowels. [In the following quotation the word is used in the peculiar sense of to hand or turn over to.]

The whole number of convicts amounted to thirty of whom sixteen were reconciled, and the remainder relaxed to the secular arm; in other words, turned over to the civil magistrate for execution. Prisoners.

SYN. To slacken, loosen, loose, remit, abate, mitigate, ease, unbend, divert.

Relax (rĕ-laks'), v.i. 1. To become loose, feeble, or languid. 'His knees relax with toil.' Pope.—2. To abate in severity; to become more mild or less rigorous.

In others she relax'd again,
And govern'd with a looser rein. Prater.

3. To remit in close attention; to unbend; as, it is useful for the student to relax often and give himself to exercise and amusements.

Relax't (rĕ-laks'), n. Relaxation. Labours and cares may have their relaxes and recreations. Feldman.

Relax't (rĕ-laks'), a. Relaxed; loose. Bacon.

Relaxable (rĕ-laks'a-bl), a. Capable of being relaxed or remitted. Barrow.

Relaxant (rĕ-laks'ant), n. A medicine that relaxes or opens.

Relaxation (rĕ-lak-a'shon), n. [L. relaxatio, relaxations. See RELAX.] 1. The act of relaxing, or the state of being relaxed; as, (a) a diminution of tension, closeness, or firmness; as, a relaxation of the muscles, fibres, or nerves; specifically, in pathol. a looseness; a diminution of the natural and healthy tone of parts. (b) Remission or abatement of rigour. 'Abatements and relaxations of the laws of Christ.' Waterland. (c) Remission of attention or application; as, relaxation of efforts.—2. The act of recreating or refreshing; recreation; a state or occupation intended to give mental or bodily relief after effort. 'Proper relaxations in business.' Addison. 'Hours of careless relaxation.' Macaulay.

But relaxation of the languid frame
By soft recumbency of outstretch'd limbs
Was bliss reserved for happier days. Croquer.

—Letters of relaxation, in Scots law, letters passing the signet, whereby a debtor was relieved from the horn, that is, from personal diligence. Such letters are not now employed in civil cases, but in criminal prosecutions. One who has been outlawed may apply to the court of justiciary for letters of relaxation reposing him against the sentence.

Relaxative (rĕ-laks'a-tiv), a. Having the quality of relaxing; laxative.

Relaxation (rĕ-laks'a-tiv), n. 1. That which has power to relax; a laxative medicine. 'You must use relaxatives.' B. Jonson.—2. What gives relaxation; a relaxation.

The Mexican festivals seem . . . as relaxatives of corporeal labours. L. Addison.

Relay (rĕ-lā'), n. [Fr. relais, a relay of horses; originally, relief or release; L.L. relatus—L. re, and lazus, loose. See RELEASE.] 1. A supply of anything laid up or kept in store for affording relief from time to time, or at successive stages. 'Who call aloud . . . for change of follies and relays of joy.' Young. Specifically, (a) a supply of horses placed on the road to be in readiness to relieve others, that a traveller may proceed without delay. (b) In hunting, a fresh set of dogs or horses, or both, placed in readiness at certain places, in case the game comes that way, to be cast off, or to mount the hunters in lieu of the horses already weary. (c) A squad of men to take a spell or turn of work at stated intervals; a shift.

2. In electric teleg. a subsidiary electro-magnetic circuit made and broken by the primary circuit. By means of an apparatus consisting of a magnet, armature, lever, &c., a current too feeble to produce sensible mechanical effects at a distance is made to set in action an auxiliary current competent for the work. Except by a battery of enormous power, currents of efficient strength can only be sent on short circuits in land telegraph lines, generally less than 50 miles, as the loss by leakage on the way is very considerable. On lines of greater length, which otherwise could not be worked from end to end, relays are therefore introduced at intermediate points. The analogy of this use of the apparatus to change of horses on a long journey is the origin of the name. Relays are also used in connection with alarms, when these are large and powerful. —Relay of ground, ground laid up in fallow. C. Richardson.

Relay (rè-là'), v. t. To lay again; to lay a second time; as, to relay a pavement.

Relbun (rèl'bun), n. The roots of Calcocaria arachnoides, largely used for dyeing woollen cloth crimson. See CALCOLARIA.

Releasable (rè-lè-a-bl), a. Capable of being released. Selden.

Release (rè-lès'), v. t. pret. & pp. released; ppr. releasing. [O.E. releas, releasan, to release, to relax, from O.Fr. releaser, relaisser, to release, to relinquish—prefix re, and laisser, to leave; l. lasciare; O.I.t. laxare; from L. laxare, to loosen, from laxus, loose, lax. Release, relax, and relax are thus the same word.] 1. To let loose again; to set free from restraint or confinement; to liberate, as from prison, confinement, or servitude. Mark xv. 9. 'Release me from my bands.' Shak.

*You release'd his courage, and set free
A valour fatal to the enemy.* Dryden.

2. To free from pain, care, trouble, grief, or any other evil.—3. To free from obligation or penalty; as, to release one from debt, from a promise or covenant.—4. To quit; to let go, as a legal claim; to remit; to discharge or relinquish, as a right to lands or tenements, by conveying it to another that has some right or estate in possession, as when the person in remainder releases his right to the tenant in possession, when one coparcener releases his right to the other, or the mortgagee releases his claim to the mortgagor.

Item, that the duchy of Anjou and the county of Maine shall be released and delivered to the king her father. Shak.

5. To relax. Hooker.—SYN. To free, liberate, loose, discharge, quit, acquit.

Release (rè-lès'), n. 1. Liberation or discharge from restraint of any kind, as from confinement or bondage. 'Release from hell.' Milton.—2. Liberation from care, pain, or any burden.

It seem'd so hard at first, mother, to leave the blessed sun,
And now it seems as hard to stay, and yet His will be done!

But still I think it can't be long before I find release. Tennyson.

3. Discharge from obligation or responsibility, as from debt, penalty, or claim of any kind; acquittance.

The king made a great feast, . . . and he made a release to the provinces, and gave gifts. Est. ii. 18.

4. In law, properly, a discharge of a right; an instrument in writing by which estates, rights, titles, entries, actions, and other things are extinguished and discharged, and sometimes transferred, abridged, or enlarged; and in general it signifies a person's giving up or discharging the right or action he has or claims to have against another or his lands.—5. In the steam-engine, the opening of the exhaust-port before the stroke is finished, to lessen the back-pressure.

Re-lease (rè-lès'), v. t. [Prefix re, and lease.] To lease again or anew.

Releasee (rè-lès-è'), n. In law, a person to whom a release is given; a releasee.

Releasement (rè-lès'ment), n. The act of releasing, as from confinement or obligation. 'Releasement from all evils.' Milton.

Releaser (rè-lès-er), n. One who releases. 'Of evils thou the chief and best releaser.'

Heywood.

Releasor (rè-lès-or), n. In law, one who grants a release; one who quits or renounces that which he has; a releasor.

Reless, † n. Release. Chaucer.

Reliefs, † n. That which is left. Chaucer.

Relegate (rè-lè-gât'), v. t. pret. & pp. relegated; ppr. relegating. [L. relega, relegatum, to send away, to banish, to remove—re, back, and lego, to send.] 1. To send away or out of the way; to consign to some obscure or remote destination; to banish.

We have not relegated religion (like something we were ashamed to show) to obscure municipalities or rustic villages. Burke.

When Mr. Disraeli was relegated to the cold shade of Opposition in 1868, he consoled himself by writing a novel. Scotsman newspaper.

2. To send into exile; to cause to remove a certain distance from Rome for a certain period; a term in Roman law.

Relegation (rè-lè-gât'shon), n. [L. rel-gatio.] The act of relegating; banishment; specifcally, a term in ancient Roman law. See RELEGATE, 2.

Relent (rè-lent'), v. t. [Fr. valentir, to slacken, to abate, to grow cool—prefix re, and alentir, from a, to, and lent, l. lentus, pliant, flexible, slow; akin to lenis, soft, smooth, pliant. See LENIENT.] 1. To soften in substance; to lose compactness; to become less rigid or hard.

In some houses, sweetmeats will relent more than in others. Bacon.

When opening buds salute the welcome day,
And earth relenting feels the genial ray. Pope.

2. To deliquesce; to dissolve; to melt.

Crows seem to call upon rain, which is but the comfort they seem to receive in the relenting of the air. Johnson.

Salt of tartar, brought to fusion and placed in a cellar, will . . . begin to relent. Boyle.

3. To become less intense; to relax. Sir K. Digby [Rave].—4. To become less harsh, cruel, or obdurate; to soften in temper; to become more mild and tender; to give way; to yield; to comply; to feel compassion. 'Relent and yield to mercy.' Shak.

Fierce Andronicus would not relent. Shak.

Stern Proserpine relented,
And gave him back the fair. Pope.

Relent (rè-lent'), v. t. 1. To slacken; to remit; to stay; to abate. 'And oftentimes he would relent his pace.' Spenser.—2. To soften; to mollify; to dissolve.

Thou art a pearl which nothing can relent
But vinegar made of devotion's tears. Davies.

Relent (rè-lent'), n. Remission; stay.

She came without relief unto the land of Amazons. Spenser.

Relentless (rè-lent'less), a. Incapable of relenting; unmoved by pity; un pitying; insensible to the distresses of others; destitute of tenderness; as, a prey to relentless despotism.

For this th' avenging power employs his darts . . .
Thus will persist, relentless in his ire. Dryden.

Unrelenting, implacable, un pitying, unmerciful, merciless, pitiless, cruel.

Relentlessly (rè-lent'less-ly), adv. In a relentless manner; without pity.

Relentlessness (rè-lent'less-ness), n. The quality of being relentless or unmoved by pity.

Relentment (rè-lent'ment), n. The act or state of relenting; compassion.

Releasee (rè-lès-è'), n. In law, the person to whom a release is executed.

Releasor (rè-lès-or), n. In law, the person who executes a release.

There must be a privity of estate between the releasor and releasee. Blackstone.

Relet (rè-lèt'), v. t. To let anew, as a house.

Relevance, Relevancy (rè-lè-vans, rè-lè-van-si), n. [See RELEVANT.] 1. The state of affording relief or aid.—2. The state or character of being relevant or bearing on the matter in hand; pertinence; applicableness; as, your argument has no relevance to the case.

Much I marvelled this ungainly fowl to hear discourse so plainly.

Though its answer little meaning—little relevancy bore. Pope.

3. In Scots law, fitness or sufficiency to bring about a decision. The relevancy of the libel, in Scots law, is the justice and sufficiency of the matters therein stated, to warrant a decree in the terms asked. The relevancy of the defence is the justice of the allegation therein made to elide the conclusion of the libel, and to warrant a decree of absolvitor.

Relevant (rè-lè-vant'), a. [Fr. relevé, ppr. relevant. See BELIEVE.] 1. Relieving; lending aid or support. Hence—2. To the purpose; pertinent; applicable; as, the testimony is not relevant to the case.

Close and relevant arguments have very little hold on the passions. Sydney Smith.

3. In Scots law, sufficient to support the cause; applied to a plea which is well founded in point of law, provided it be true in fact. SYN. Pertinent, applicable, apposite, appropriate, suitable, fit.

Relevantly (rè-lè-vant-li), adv. In a relevant manner.

Relevation (rè-lè-vât'shon), n. A raising or lifting up.

Reliability (rè-lè-a-blî-tî-ti), n. The state or quality of being reliable; reliableness. Coleridge.

Reliable (rè-lè-a-bl), a. Such as may be relied on; fit or worthy to be relied on; to be depended on. This word has been again and again attacked by different writers, having been at various times stigmatized as an Americanism, as irregular in formation, as unnecessary, as vulgar, and what not. Against such charges, however, it has found able defenders, the most notable of whom is Mr. Fitzedward Hall, in his little work On English Adjectives in -able, with Special Reference to Reliable. The first instance of its use as known to him was in a paper written by Coleridge to the Morning Post in 1800, the expression in which it occurs being 'the best means, and most reliable pledge.' Coleridge used it repeatedly afterwards; and it has also been used by many good writers since. It is now, indeed, of everyday occurrence, though no doubt certain persons still object to the use of it. Among those who have employed it Mr. Hall mentions Rev. James Martineau, Mr. Gladstone, Dr. Newman, Mr. John Stuart Mill, Dr. Henry Maudslay, Bishop Wilberforce, Dean Mansel, Harriet Martineau, and Mr. Leslie Stephen—names surely sufficient to support any one who chooses to use the vocable in question. That it is unnecessary is not quite the fact, at least we can hardly admit that its place is already sufficiently occupied by trustworthy or trusty as is usually stated. 'If this were true,' says Mr. Hall, 'inasmuch as we have trust, verb and substantive, there would be no need of rely and reliance; they must be wholly superfluous. But we rely where we look for support; we trust where we apprehend no deception; and reliable and trustworthy or trusty, properly employed, are no less different than their respective verbs. In corollary to this, rely except metaphorically, has not a personal reference, whereas trust has; and the best writers who have hitherto practically accepted reliable, have applied it to things solely. That many persons use reliable instead of trustworthy, of course, no ground for rejecting it.' That it is formed after a somewhat uncommon model is also no sufficient ground for rejecting it, when we find in good use such words as available, such as one may avail one's self of; conversable, such as may be conversed with; dispensable, that may be dispensed with, and similarly indispensable; laughable, worthy of being laughed at, and sundry others. Altogether it seems too late in the day to protest against the use of the word now; those who do not like it can let it alone; but as Professor Whitney remarks (the quotation is from Mr. Hall):—'We have had to swallow too many linguistic camels, to want to make life more uncomfortable by straining at such gnats as that.'

According to General Livingston's humorous account, his own village of Elizabethtown was not much more reliable, being peopled in those agitated times by unknown, unrecommended strangers, gully-looking Tories, and very knavish Whigs. It being.

He (Mr. Grote) seems to think that the reliable chronology of Greece begins before its reliable history. Goodstone.

Above all, the grand and only reliable security, in the last resort, against the despotism of the government, is in that case wanting—the sympathy of the army with the people. J. S. Mill.

The sturdy peasant has become very well accustomed to that spectacle, and regards the said lord as his most reliable source of trinkets and other pecuniary advantages. Leslie Stephen.

Reliableness (rè-lè-a-blî-ness), n. The state or quality of being reliable; reliability.

But the number of steps in an argument does not subtract from its reliableness, if no new premises of an uncertain character are taken up by the way. J. S. Mill.

I remember . . . being very much struck with the way in which people in Austrian Croatia talked of the truthfulness and reliableness of their Turkish neighbours. Grant Duff.

Reliably (rè-lè-a-blî), adv. In a reliable manner; so as to be relied on.

Reliance (rè-lî-ans), n. [From rely, reliant.] 1. The act of relying, or the state or quality of being reliant; confident rest for support; confidence; dependence; as, we may have perfect reliance on the promises of God; to have reliance on the testimony of witnesses.

'Reliance on the divine mercies.' Richardson. 'In reliance on promises which proved to be of very little value.' Macaulay.

Those in whom he had reliance
For his noble name,
With one smile of still defiance
Sold him into shame. Tennyson.

2. Anything on which to rely; sure dependence; ground of trust.

Reliant (rè-lî-ant'), a. Having or indicating reliance or confidence; confident; self-reliant; as, a reliant spirit; a reliant bearing.

Relic (rè-lîk'), n. [Older relique, from Fr. relique; L. reliquia, remains—re, back, and linguo, to leave, from root lig, akin to lig; in by blood or alliance, particularly by consanguinity; as, a person related in the first or second degree.—3. Standing in some relation or connection; as, the arts of painting and sculpture are closely related.—4. In music, same as Relative.

Relatedness (rê-lâ'ted-nes), n. The state or condition of being related; affinity. Emerson.

Relater (rê-lât'ér), n. One who relates, recites, or narrates; an historian. 'A tedious relater of facts.' Swift.

Relation (rê-lâ'shon), n. [L. relatio, relationis, from refero, relatum. See RELATE.] 1. The act of relating or telling, or that which is related or told; recital; account; narration; narrative of facts; as, an historical relation; we listened to the relation of his adventures.—2. Respect; reference; regard; generally or always in the phrase in relation to.

I have been importuned to make some observations on this art, in relation to its agreement with poetry. Dryden.

3. Connection perceived or imagined between things; a certain position occupied by one thing with regard to another; the condition of being such or such in respect to something else; as, the relation of a citizen to the state; the relation of a subject to the supreme authority; the relation of husband to wife, or of master to servant.

Any sort of connection which is perceived or imagined between two or more things, or any comparison which is made by the mind, is a relation. Ts. Taylor.

Although relations are not real entities, but merely mental modes of viewing things, let it be observed that our ideas of relation are not vague nor arbitrary, but are determined by the known qualities of the related objects. Fleming.

4. Connection by consanguinity or affinity; kinship; tie of birth or marriage; relationship.

Relations dear, and all the charities
Of father, son, and brother, first were known.' Milton.

Are we not to pity and supply the poor though they have no relation to us? . . . the gospel stiles them all our brethren. Bp. Sprat.

5. A person connected by consanguinity or affinity; a kinsman or kinswoman.

A she-cousin, of a good family and small fortune, passed months among all her relations. Swift.

6. In math. ratio; proportion. The term is sometimes used in a more general sense in reference to two quantities which have something in common by means of which they may be compared, or indicating any dependence of one quantity upon another.

7. In logic, one of the ten predicaments or accidents belonging to substance.—8. In arch. the direct conformity to each other, and to the whole, of the different parts of a building.—9. In law, (a) where two different times or other things are accounted as one, and by some act done, the thing subsequent is said to take effect by relation from the time preceding. (b) The act of a relator at whose instance an information is filed. See RELATOR.—Inharmonic relation, in music, a term denoting that a dissonant sound is introduced which was not heard in the preceding chord.—SYN. Recital, rehearsal, narration, account, narrative, tale, detail, description, kindred, consanguinity, affinity, kinsman, kinswoman.

Relational (rê-lâ'shon-al), a. 1. Having relation or kindred.

We might be tempted to take these two nations for relational stems. Took.

2. Indicating or specifying some relation: used in contradistinction to notional; as, a relational part of speech. The pronoun, preposition, and conjunction are relational parts of speech.

Relationist (rê-lâ'shon-ist), n. A relative; a relation. Sir T. Browne.

Relationship (rê-lâ'shon-ship), n. The state of being related by kindred, affinity, or other alliance.

Relative (rel'a-tiv), a. [Fr. relatif, L. relatus, from refero. See RELATE.] 1. Having relation to or bearing on something; close in connection; pertinent; relevant; as, the arguments may be good, but they are not relative to the subject. 'Grounds more relative than this.' Shak.—2. Not absolute or existing by itself; considered as belonging to or respecting something else; depending on or incident to something.

Everything sustains both an absolute and a relative capacity; an absolute, as it is such a thing, enclosed with such a nature; and a relative, as it is a part of the universe, and so stands in such a relation to the whole. South.

Relative rights of persons are incident to them as members of society, and standing in various relations to each other. Blackstone.

3. In gram. applied to a word which relates to another word, sentence, or part of a sentence called the antecedent; as, the relative pronouns who, which, and that.—4. In music, relative chord, a common chord made up of notes taken from the scale; as the chords of D minor, E minor, F major, G major, and A minor are minor to the chord or scale of C, these being the only common chords which can be made from the scale of C.—Relative key, a key whose tonic chord is a relative chord; that is, a key whose first, third, and fifth degrees form a common chord made up of notes of the key to which it is related.—Relative mode, in music, the mode which the composer interweaves with the principal mode in the flow of the harmony.—Relative chronology, in geol. the geological method of computing time, as opposed to the absolute or historical method.—Relative gravity. The same as Specific Gravity.—Relative motion, the change of the relative place of a moving body with respect to some other body also in motion.—Relative place, that part of space which is considered with regard to other adjacent objects.—Relative terms, in logic, terms which imply relation, as guardian and ward, master and servant, husband and wife.—Relative time, the sensible measure of any part of duration by means of motion.

Relative (rel'a-tiv), n. 1. Something considered in its relation to something else; one of two things having a certain relation. 2. A person connected by blood or affinity; especially, one allied by blood; a relation; a kinsman or kinswoman.

Our friends and relatives stand weeping by,
Dissolv'd in tears to see us die. Pemfret.

3. In gram. a word which relates to or represents another word, called its antecedent, or refers back to a sentence or member of a sentence, or to a series of sentences, constituting its antecedent; a relative pronoun. 'He seldom lives frugally who lives by chance.' Here who is the relative, which represents he, the antecedent. 'Judas declared him innocent, which he could not be, had he deceived his disciples.' Porteus. Here which refers to innocent, an adjective, as its antecedent. 'Another reason that makes me doubt of any innate practical principles is, that I think there cannot any one moral rule be proposed whereof a man may not justly demand a reason, which would be perfectly ridiculous and absurd if they were innate, or so much as self-evident, which every innate principle must needs be.' Locke. Here the first which refers to the demanding of a reason, the second to self-evident.—4. In logic, a relative term. See the adjective.

Relatively (rel'a-tiv-li), adv. In a relative manner; in relation or respect to something else; with relation to each other and to other things; not absolutely; comparatively: often followed by to; as, his expenditure in charity was large relatively to his income.

Consider the absolute affections of any being as it is in itself before you consider it relatively. Watts.

Relativeness (rel'a-tiv-nes), n. The state of being relative or having relation.

Relativity (rel-a-tiv'i-ti), n. Relativeness. Coleridge. [Rare.]

Relator (rê-lât'ér), n. 1. One who relates; a rehearser; a narrator or reciter. 'The several relators of this history.' Fuller.—2. In law, a private person at whose instance an information is allowed to be filed, and in whose behalf certain writs are issued; a prosecutor.

Relatrix (rê-lât'rika), n. In law, a female relator or petitioner. Story.

Relax (rê-laks'), v.t. [L. relaxo, to loosen, to slacken, to relax—re, back, again, and laxo, to loosen, to widen, from laxus, wide, loose, open (whence lax).] 1. To slacken; to make less tense or rigid; to loosen; to make less close or firm; as, to relax a rope or cord; to relax the muscles or sinews.

Horror chill
Ran through his veins, and all his joints relax'd.
Some good survivor with his flute would go
Piping a ditty sad for Bon's fate,
And cross the unpermitted ferry's flow,

2. To make less severe or rigorous; to remit or abate in strictness; as, to relax a law or rule of justice.

The statute of mortmain was at several times relaxed by the legislature. Swif.

3. To remit or abate in respect to attention, assiduity, effort, or labour; to unbend; as, to relax study; to relax exertions or efforts. 4. To relieve from attention or effort, to afford a relaxation to; as, conversation relaxes the mind of the student.—5. To relieve from constipation; to loosen; to open, as, medicines relax the bowels. [In the following quotation the word is used in the peculiar sense of to hand or turn over to.]

The whole number of convicts amounted to thirty of whom sixteen were reconciled, and the remainder relaxed to the secular arm; in other words, turned over to the civil magistrate for execution. Prætor.

SYN. To slacken, loosen, loose, remit, abate, mitigate, ease, unbend, divert.

Relax (rê-laks'), v.i. 1. To become loose, feeble, or languid. 'His knees relax with toil.' Pope.—2. To abate in severity; to become more mild or less rigorous.

In others the relax'd again,
And govern'd with a looser rein. Prior.

3. To remit in close attention; to unbend; as, it is useful for the student to relax often and give himself to exercise and amusements.

Relax't (rê-laks'), n. Relaxation.
Labours and cares may have their relax't and recreations. Falstaff.

Relax't (rê-laks'), a. Relaxed; loose. Bacon. Relaxable (rê-laks'a-bl), a. Capable of being relaxed or remitted. Barrow.

Relaxant (rê-laks'ant), n. A medicine that relaxes or opens.

Relaxation (rê-laks'a-shon), n. [L. relaxatio, relaxationis. See RELAX.] 1. The act of relaxing, or the state of being relaxed; as, (a) a diminution of tension, closeness, or firmness; as, a relaxation of the muscles, fibres, or nerves; specifically, in pathol. a looseness; a diminution of the natural and healthy tone of parts. (b) Remission or abatement of rigour. 'Abatement of relaxations of the laws of Christ.' Waterland. (c) Remission of attention or application; as, relaxation of efforts.—2. The act of recreating or refreshing; recreation; a state or occupation intended to give mental or bodily relief after effort. 'Proper relaxations in business.' Addison. 'Hours of careless relaxation.' Macaulay.

But relaxation of the languid frame
By soft recumbency of outstretch'd limbs
Was bliss reserved for happier days. Cougher.

—Letters of relaxation, in Scots law, letters passing the signet, whereby a debtor was relieved from the horn, that is, from personal diligence. Such letters are not now employed in civil cases, but in criminal prosecutions. One who has been outlawed may apply to the court of justiciary for letters of relaxation reposing him against the sentence.

Relaxative (rê-laks'a-tiv), a. Having the quality of relaxing; laxative.

Relaxative (rê-laks'a-tiv), n. 1. That which has power to relax; a laxative medicine. 'You must use relaxatives.' B. Jonson.—2. What gives relaxation; a relaxation.

The Morocco festivals seem . . . as relaxatives of corporeal labours. L. Addison.

Relay (rê-lâ'), n. [Fr. relais, a relay of horses; originally, relief or release; L.L. relarius—L. re, and larius, loose. See RELAXE.] 1. A supply of anything laid up or kept in store for affording relief from time to time, or at successive stages. 'Who call aloud . . . for change of follies and relays of joy.' Young. Specifically, (a) a supply of horses placed on the road to be in readiness to relieve others, that a traveller may proceed without delay. (b) In hunting, a fresh set of dogs or horses, or both, placed in readiness at certain places, in case the game comes that way, to be cast off, or to mount the hunters in lieu of the horses already weary. (c) A squad of men to take a spell or turn of work at stated intervals; a shift.

2. In electric teleg. a subsidiary electro-magnetic circuit made and broken by the primary circuit. By means of an apparatus consisting of a magnet, armature, lever, &c., a current too feeble to produce sensible mechanical effects at a distance is made to set in action an auxiliary current competent for the work. Except by a battery of enormous power, currents of efficient strength can only be sent on short circuits in land telegraph lines, generally less than 50 miles, as the loss by leakage on the way is very considerable. On lines of greater length, which otherwise could not be worked from end to end, relays are therefore introduced at intermediate points. The analogy of this use of the apparatus to change of horses on a long journey is the origin of the name. Relays are also used in connection with alarms, when these are large and powerful. — Relay of ground, ground laid up in fallow. C. Richardson.

Relay (ré-lá'), v. t. To lay again; to lay a second time; as, to relay a pavement.

Relbun (rel'bun), n. The roots of Calceolaria arachnoides, largely used for dyeing woollen cloth crimson. See CALCEOLARIA.

Releaseable (ré-lés-a-bl), a. Capable of being released. Selden.

Release (ré-lés'), v. t. pret. & pp. released; ppr. releasing. [O. E. release, release, to release, to relax, from O. Fr. releaser, relaiser, to release, to relinquish—prefix re-, and laisser, to leave; It. lasciare; O. It. lassare; from L. lassare, to loosen, from lassus, loose, lax. Release, relax, and relay are thus the same word.] 1. To let loose again; to set free from restraint or confinement; to liberate, as from prison, confinement, or servitude. Mark xv. 9. 'Release me from my hands.' Shak.

Thou releas'd his courage, and set free
A valour fatal to the enemy. Dryden.

2. To free from pain, care, trouble, grief, or any other evil.—3. To free from obligation or penalty; as, to release one from debt, from a promise or covenant.—4. To quit; to let go, as a legal claim; to remit; to discharge or relinquish, as a right to lands or tenements, by conveying it to another that has some right or estate in possession, as when the person in remainder releases his right to the tenant in possession, when one coparcener releases his right to the other, or the mortgagee releases his claim to the mortgagor.

Item, that the duchy of Anjou and the county of Maine shall be released and delivered to the king her father. Shak.

5. To relax. Hooker.—SYN. To free, liberate, loose, discharge, quit, acquit.

Release (ré-lés'), n. 1. Liberation or discharge from restraint of any kind, as from confinement or bondage. 'Release from hell.' Milton.—2. Liberation from care, pain, or any burden.

It seem'd so hard at first, mother, to leave the blessed sun,
And now it seems as hard to stay, and yet His will be done!

But still I think it can't be long before I find release. Tennyson.

3. Discharge from obligation or responsibility, as from debt, penalty, or claim of any kind; acquittance.

The king made a great feast . . . and he made a release to the provinces, and gave gifts. Est. ii. 18.

4. In law, properly, a discharge of a right; an instrument in writing by which estates, rights, titles, entries, actions, and other things are extinguished and discharged, and sometimes transferred, abridged, or enlarged; and in general it signifies a person's giving up or discharging the right or action he has or claims to have against another or his lands.—5. In the steam-engine, the opening of the exhaust-port before the stroke is finished, to lessen the back-pressure.

Re-lease (ré-lés'), s. t. [Prefix re-, and lease.] To lease again or anew.

Releasee (ré-lés'-é), n. In law, a person to whom a release is given; a releasee.

Releasement (ré-lés'ment), n. The act of releasing, as from confinement or obligation. 'Releasement from all evils.' Milton.

Releaser (ré-lés'-ér), n. One who releases. 'Of evils thou the chief and best releaser.' Heywood.

Releasor (ré-lés'-or), n. In law, one who grants a release; one who quits or renounces that which he has; a releasor.

Religate (rel'-gát), v. t. pret. & pp. religated; ppr. religating. [L. relega, relegatus, to send away, to banish, to remove—re-, back, and lego, to send.] 1. To send away or out of the way; to consign to some obscure or remote destination; to banish.

We have not religated religion (like something we were ashamed to show) to obscure municipalities or rustic villages. Barth.

When Mr. Disraeli was religated to the cold shade of Opposition in 1858, he consoled himself by writing a novel. Sentimental newspaper.

2. To send into exile; to cause to remove a certain distance from Rome for a certain period; a term in Roman law.

Religation (rel'-gá'shon), n. [L. religatio.] The act of relegating; banishment; specifcally, a term in ancient Roman law. See RELEGATE, 2.

Relent (ré-lent'), v. i. [Fr. valentir, to slacken, to abate, to grow cool—prefix re-, and alentir, from a-, to, and lent, L. lentus, pliant, flexible, slow; akin to lenis, soft, smooth, pliant. See LENIENT.] 1. To soften in substance; to lose compactness; to become less rigid or hard.

In some houses, sweetmeats will relent more than in others. Bacon.

When opening buds salute the welcome day,
And earth relenting feels the genial ray. Pope.

2. To deliquesce; to dissolve; to melt.

Crows seem to call upon rain, which is but the comfort they seem to receive in the relenting of the air. Bacon.

Salt of tartar, brought to fusion and placed in a cellar, will . . . begin to relent. Boyle.

3. To become less intense; to relax. Sir K. Digby (Kare.)—4. To become less harsh, cruel, or obstinate; to soften in temper; to become more mild and tender; to give way; to yield; to comply; to feel compassion. 'Relent and yield to mercy.' Shak.

Fierce Andronicus would not relent. Shak.

Stern Proserpine relenting,
And gave him back the fair. Pope.

Relent (ré-lent'), v. t. 1. To slacken; to remit; to stay; to abate. 'And oftentimes he would relent his pace.' Spenser.—2. To soften; to mollify; to dissolve.

Thou art a pearl which nothing can relent
But vinegar made of devotion's tears. Davies.

Relent (ré-lent'), n. Remission; stay.

She came without relent unto the land of Amara. Spenser.

Relentless (ré-lent'les), a. Incapable of relenting; unmoved by pity; unyielding; insensible to the distresses of others; destitute of tenderness; as, a prey to relentless despotism.

For this th' avenging power employs his darts . . .
Thus will persist, relentless in his ire. Dryden.

Stx. Unrelenting, implacable, un pitying, unmerciful, merciless, pitiless, cruel.

Relentlessly (ré-lent'les-ly), adv. In a relentless manner; without pity.

Relentlessness (ré-lent'les-ness), n. The quality of being relentless or unmoved by pity.

Relentment (ré-lent'ment), n. The act or state of relenting; compassion.

Releasee (ré-lés'-é), n. In law, the person to whom a release is executed.

Releasor (ré-lés'-or), n. In law, the person who executes a release.

There must be a privacy of estate between the releasor and releasee. Blackstone.

Relat (ré-lét'), v. t. To let anew, as a house. Relevance, Relevancy (rel'-evans, rel'-ev-an-si), n. [See RELEVANT.] 1. The state of affording relief or aid.—2. The state or character of being relevant or bearing on the matter in hand; pertinence; applicableness; as, your argument has no relevance to the case.

Much I marvelled this ungainly fowl to hear discourse so plainly,
Though its answer little meaning—little relevancy bore. Poe.

3. In Scots law, fitness or sufficiency to bring about a decision. The relevancy of the libel, in Scots law, is the justice and sufficiency of the matters therein stated, to warrant a decree in the terms asked. The relevancy of the defence is the justice of the allegation therein made to elide the conclusion of the libel, and to warrant a decree of absolvitor.

Relevant (rel'-evant), a. [Fr. relever, ppr. relevant. See RELIEVE.] 1. Relieving; lending aid or support. Hence—2. To the purpose; pertinent; applicable; as, the testimony is not relevant to the case.

Close and relevant arguments have very little hold on the passions. Sydney Smith.

3. In Scots law, sufficient to support the cause; applied to a plea which is well founded in point of law, provided it be true in fact.

SYN. Pertinent, applicable, apposite, appropriate, suitable, fit.

Relevantly (rel'-evant-ly), adv. In a relevant manner.

Relevation (rel'-é-vá'shon), n. A raising or lifting up.

Reliability (ré-lí-a-bil'-i-ti), n. The state or quality of being reliable; reliableness. Coleridge.

Reliable (ré-lí-a-bl), a. Such as may be relied on; fit or worthy to be relied on; to be depended on. This word has been again and again attacked by different writers, having been at various times stigmatized as an Americanism, as irregular in formation, as unnecessary, as vulgar, and whatnot. Against such charges, however, it has found able defenders, the most notable of whom is Mr. Fitzedward Hall, in his little work On English Adjectives in -able, with Special Reference to Reliable. The first instance of its use as known to him was in a paper written by Coleridge to the Morning Post in 1800, the expression in which it occurs being 'the best means, and most reliable pledge.'

Coleridge used it repeatedly afterwards; and it has also been used by many good writers since. It is now, indeed, of every-day occurrence, though no doubt certain persons still object to the use of it. Among those who have employed it Mr. Hall mentions Rev. James Martineau, Mr. Gladstone, Dr. Newman, Mr. John Stuart Mill, Dr. Henry Maudslay, Bishop Wilberforce, Dean Mansel, Harriet Martineau, and Mr. Leslie Stephen—names surely sufficient to support any one who chooses to use the vocable in question. That it is unnecessary, is not quite the fact, at least we can hardly admit that its place is already sufficiently occupied by trustworthy or trust as is usually stated.

'If this were true,' says Mr. Hall, 'inasmuch as we have trust, verb and substantive, there would be no need of rely and reliance: they must be wholly superfluous. But we rely where we look for support; we trust where we apprehend no deception; and reliable and trustworthy or trust, properly employed, are no less different than their respective verbs. In corollary to this, rely except metaphorically, has not a personal reference, whereas trust has; and the best writers who have hitherto practically accepted reliable, have applied it to things solely. That many persons use reliable instead of trustworthy is, of course, no ground for rejecting it. That it is formed after a somewhat uncommon model is also no sufficient ground for rejecting it, when we find in good use such words as available, such as one may avail one's self of; conversible, such as may be conversed with; dispensable, that may be dispensed with, and similarly indispensable; laughable, worthy of being laughed at, and sundry others. Altogether it seems too late in the day to protest against the use of the word now; those who do not like it can let it alone; but as Professor Whitney remarks (the quotation is from Mr. Hall):—'We have had to swallow too many linguistic camels, to want to make life more uncomfortable by straining at such gnats as that.'

According to General Livingston's humorous account, his own village of Elizabethtown was not much reliable, being peopled in those agitated times by unknown, unrecommended strangers, gully-looking Tories, and very knavish whigs. J. S. Mill.

He (Mr. Grote) seems to think that the reliable chronology of Greece begins before its reliable history. Gladstone.

Above all, the grand and only reliable security, in the last resort, against the despotism of the government, is in that case wanting—the sympathy of the army with the people. J. S. Mill.

The sturdy peasant . . . has become very well accustomed to that spectacle, and regards the sordid lord as his most reliable source of trinkets and other pecuniary advantages. Leslie Stephen.

Reliability (ré-lí-a-bl-ness), n. The state or quality of being reliable; reliableness.

But the number of steps in an argument does not subtract from its reliableness, if no new premises of an uncertain character are taken up by the way. J. S. Mill.

I remember . . . being very much struck with the way in which people in Austrian Croatia talked of the truthfulness and reliableness of their Turkish neighbours. Grant Duff.

Reliably (ré-lí-a-bl-ly), adv. In a reliable manner; so as to be relied on.

Reliance (ré-lí-ans), n. [From rely, reliant.] 1. The act of relying, or the state or quality of being reliant; confident rest for support; confidence; dependence; as, we may have perfect reliance on the promises of God; to have reliance on the testimony of witnesses.

'Reliance on the divine mercies.' Richardson. 'In reliance on promises which proved to be of very little value.' Macaulay.

Those, in whom he had reliance
For his noble name,
With one smile of still defiance
Sold him into shame. Tennyson.

2. Anything on which to rely; sure dependence; ground of trust.

Reliant (ré-lí-ant), a. Having or indicating reliance or confidence; confident; self-reliant; as, a reliant spirit; a reliant bearing.

Relic (rel'ik), n. (Older relique, from F. relique; L. reliquie, remains—re-, back, and linguo, to leave, from root lig, akin to lig; in by blood or alliance, particularly by consanguinity; as, a person related in the first or second degree.—3. Standing in some relation or connection; as, the arts of painting and sculpture are closely related.—4. In music, same as Relative.

Relatedness (rê-lât'ed-nes), n. The state or condition of being related; affinity. Emerson.

Relater (rê-lât'ér), n. One who relates, recites, or narrates; an historian. 'A tedious relater of facts.' Swift.

Relation (rê-lâ'shon), n. [L. relatio, relationis, from refero, relatum. See RELATE.] 1. The act of relating or telling, or that which is related or told; recital; account; narration; narrative of facts; as, an historical relation; we listened to the relation of his adventures.—2. Respect; reference; regard; generally or always in the phrase in relation to.

I have been importuned to make some observations on this art, in relation to its agreement with poetry. Dryden.

3. Connection perceived or imagined between things; a certain position occupied by one thing with regard to another; the condition of being such or such in respect to something else; as, the relation of a citizen to the state; the relation of a subject to the supreme authority; the relation of husband to wife, or of master to servant.

Any sort of connection which is perceived or imagined between two or more things, or any comparison which is made by the mind, is a relation. Taylor.

Although relations are not real entities, but merely mental modes of viewing things, let it be observed that our ideas of relation are not vague nor arbitrary, but are determined by the known qualities of the related objects. Fleming.

4. Connection by consanguinity or affinity; kinship; tie of birth or marriage; relationship.

Relations dear, and all the charities
Of father, son, and brother, first were known. Milton.

Are we not to pity and supply the poor though they have no relations to us? . . . the gospel stiles them all our brethren. Sp. Synod.

5. A person connected by consanguinity or affinity; a kinsman or kinswoman.

A she-cousin, of a good family and small fortune, passed months among all her relations. Swift.

6. In math. ratio; proportion. The term is sometimes used in a more general sense in reference to two quantities which have something in common by means of which they may be compared, or indicating any dependence of one quantity upon another.

7. In logic, one of the ten predicaments or accidents belonging to substance.—8. In arch. the direct conformity to each other, and to the whole, of the different parts of a building.—9. In law, (a) where two different times or other things are accounted as one, and by some act done, the thing subsequent is said to take effect by relation from the time preceding. (b) The act of a relator at whose instance an information is filed. See RELATOR.—In harmonic relation, in music, a term denoting that a dissonant sound is introduced which was not heard in the preceding chord.—SYN. Recital, rehearsal, narration, account, narrative, tale, detail, description, kindred, consanguinity, affinity, kinsman, kinswoman.

Relational (rê-lâ'shon-al), a. 1. Having relation or kindred.

We might be tempted to take these two nations for relational stems. Tooke.

2. Indicating or specifying some relation: used in contradistinction to notional; as, a relational part of speech. The pronoun, preposition, and conjunction are relational parts of speech.

Relationist (rê-lâ'shon-ist), n. A relative; a relationist. Sir T. Browne.

Relationship (rê-lâ'shon-ship), n. The state of being related by kindred, affinity, or other alliance.

Relative (rê-lâ-tiv), a. [Fr. relatif, L. relatus, from refero. See RELATE.] 1. Having relation to or bearing on something; close in connection; pertinent; relevant; as, the arguments may be good, but they are not relative to the subject. 'Grounds more relative than this.' Shak.—2. Not absolute or existing by itself; considered as belonging to or respecting something else; depending on or incident to relation.

Everything sustains both an absolute and a relative capacity; an absolute, as it is such a thing, enclosed with such a nature; and a relative, as it is a part of the universe, and so stands in such a relation to the whole. South.

Relative rights of persons are incident to them as members of society, and standing in various relations to each other. Blackstone.

3. In gram. applied to a word which relates to another word, sentence, or part of a sentence called the antecedent; as, the relative pronouns who, which, and that.—4. In music, relative chord, a common chord made up of notes taken from the scale; as the chords of D minor, E minor, F major, G major, and A minor are relative to the chord or scale of C, these being the only common chords which can be made from the scale of C.—Relative key, a key whose tonic chord is a relative chord; that is, a key whose first, third, and fifth degrees form a common chord made up of notes of the key to which it is related.—Relative mode, in music, the mode which the composer interweaves with the principal mode in the flow of the harmony.—Relative chronology, in geol. the geological method of computing time, as opposed to the absolute or historical method.—Relative gravity. The same as Specific Gravity.—Relative motion, the change of the relative place of a moving body with respect to some other body also in motion.—Relative place, that part of space which is considered with regard to other adjacent objects.—Relative terms, in logic, terms which imply relation, as guardian and ward, master and servant, husband and wife.—Relative time, the sensible measure of any part of duration by means of motion.

Relative (rê-lâ-tiv), n. 1. Something considered in its relation to something else; one of two things having a certain relation. 2. A person connected by blood or affinity; especially, one allied by blood; a relation; a kinsman or kinswoman.

Our friends and relatives stand weeping by,
Dissolv'd in tears to see us die. Pope/Pet.

3. In gram. a word which relates to or represents another word, called its antecedent, or refers back to a sentence or member of a sentence, or to a series of sentences, constituting its antecedent; a relative pronoun. 'He seldom lives frugally who lives by chance.' Here who is the relative, which represents he, the antecedent. 'Judas declared him innocent, which he could not be, had he deceived his disciples.' Porteus. Here which refers to innocent, an adjective, as its antecedent. 'Another reason that makes me doubt of any innate practical principles is, that I think there cannot any one moral rule be proposed whereof a man may not justly demand a reason, which would be perfectly ridiculous and absurd if they were innate, or so much as self-evident, which every innate principle must needs be.' Locke. Here the first which refers to the demanding of a reason, the second to self-evident.—4. In logic, a relative term. See the adjective.

Relatively (rê-lâ-tiv-ly), adv. In a relative manner; in relation or respect to something else; with relation to each other and to other things; not absolutely; comparatively: often followed by to; as, his expenditure in charity was large relatively to his income.

Consider the absolute affections of any being as it is in itself before you consider it relatively. Watts.

Relativeness (rê-lâ-tiv-nes), n. The state of being relative or having relation.

Relativity (rê-lâ-tiv-ty), n. Relativeness. Coleridge. [Rare.]

Relator (rê-lât'ér), n. 1. One who relates; a rehearser; a narrator or reciter. 'The several relators of this history.' Fuller.—2. In law, a private person at whose instance an information is allowed to be filed, and in whose behalf certain writs are issued; a prosecutor.

Relatrix (rê-lât'riks), n. In law, a female relator or petitioner. Story.

Relax (rê-laks'), v. t. [L. relaxo, to loosen, to slacken, to relax—re, back, again, and laxo, to loosen, to widen, from laxus, wide, loose, open (whence lax)] 1. To slacken; to make less tense or rigid; to loosen; to make less close or firm; as, to relax a rope or cord; to relax the muscles or sinews.

Horror chill
Ran through his veins, and all his joints relax'd. Milton.

Some good survivor with his flute would go
Piping a ditty sad for Buon's fate,
And cross the unpurported ferry's bow,

2. To make less severe or rigorous; to remit or abate in strictness; as, to relax a law or rule of justice.

The statute of mortmain was at several times relaxed by the legislature. Swift.

3. To remit or abate in respect to attention, assiduity, effort, or labour; to unbend; as, to relax study; to relax exertions or efforts. 4. To relieve from attention or effort, to afford a relaxation to; as, conversation relaxes the mind of the student.—5. To relieve from constipation; to loosen; to open, as, medicines relax the bowels. [In the following quotation the word is used in the peculiar sense of to hand or turn over to.]

The whole number of convicts amounted to thirty, of whom sixteen were reconciled, and the remainder relaxed to the secular arm; in other words, turned over to the civil magistrate for execution. Prior.

SYN. To slacken, loosen, loose, remit, abate, mitigate, ease, unbend, divert.

Relax (rê-laks'), v. i. 1. To become loose, feeble, or languid. 'His knees relax with toil.' Pope.—2. To abate in severity; to become more mild or less rigorous.

In others she relax'd again,
And govern'd with a looser rein. Prior.

3. To remit in close attention; to unbend; as, it is useful for the student to relax often and give himself to exercise and amusements.

Relaxant (rê-laks'-ant), n. Relaxation.

Labours and cares may have their relaxant and recreations. Fellows.

Relaxant (rê-laks'-ant), a. Relaxed; loose. Brown. Relaxant (rê-laks'-ant), a. Capable of being relaxed or remitted. Barrow.

Relaxant (rê-laks'-ant), n. A medicine that relaxes or opens.

Relaxation (rê-laks'-shon), n. [L. relaxatio, relaxationis. See RELAX.] 1. The act of relaxing, or the state of being relaxed; as, (a) a diminution of tension, closeness, or firmness; as, a relaxation of the muscles, fibres, or nerves; specifically, in pathol. a looseness; a diminution of the natural and healthy tone of parts. (b) Remission or abatement of rigour. 'Abatements and relaxations of the laws of Christ.' Waterland. (c) Remission of attention or application; as, relaxation of efforts.—2. The act of recreating or refreshing; recreation; a state or occupation intended to give mental or bodily relief after effort. 'Proper relaxations in business.' Addison. 'Hours of careless relaxation.' Macaulay.

But relaxation of the languid frame
By soft recumbency of outstretch'd limbs
Was bliss reserved for happier days. Compton.

—Letters of relaxation, in Scots law, letters passing the signet, whereby a debtor was relieved from the horn, that is, from personal diligence. Such letters are not now employed in civil cases, but in criminal prosecutions. One who has been outlawed may apply to the court of justiciary for letters of relaxation reposing him against the sentence.

Relaxative (rê-laks'-at-iv), a. Having the quality of relaxing; laxative.

Relaxative (rê-laks'-at-iv), n. 1. That which has power to relax; a laxative medicine. 'You must use relaxatives.' B. Jonson.—2. What gives relaxation; a relaxation.

The Moresco festivals seem . . . as relaxatives of corporal labours. L. Addison.

Relay (rê-lâ'), n. [Fr. relais, a relay of horses; originally, relief or release; L. L. relaxus—L. re, and laxus, loose. See RELAX.] 1. A supply of anything laid up or kept in store for affording relief from time to time, or at successive stages. 'Who call aloud for change of follies and relays of joy.' Young. Specifically, (a) a supply of horses placed on the road to be in readiness to relieve others, that a traveller may proceed without delay. (b) In hunting, a fresh set of dogs or horses, or both, placed in readiness at certain places, in case the game comes that way, to be cast off, or to mount the hunters in lieu of the horses already weary. (c) A squad of men to take a spell or turn of work at stated intervals; a shift.

2. In electric teleg. a subsidiary electro-magnetic circuit made and broken by the primary circuit. By means of an apparatus consisting of a magnet, armature, lever, &c., a current too feeble to produce sensible mechanical effects at a distance is made to set in action an auxiliary current competent for the work. Except by a battery of enormous power, currents of efficient strength can only be sent on short circuits in land telegraph lines, generally less than 50 miles, as the loss by leakage on the way is very considerable. On lines of greater length, which otherwise could not be worked from end to end, relays are therefore introduced at intermediate points. The analogy of this use of the apparatus to change of horses on a long journey is the origin of the name. Relays are also used in connection with alarms, when these are large and powerful. — Relay of ground, ground laid up in fallow. C. Richardson.

Relay (ré-lá'), v.t. To lay again; to lay a second time; as, to relay a pavement.

Relban (rél'bun), n. The roots of Calceolaria arachnoidea, largely used for dyeing woollen cloth crimson. See CALCEOLARIA.

Releasable (ré-lés'a-bl), a. Capable of being released. Selden.

Release (ré-lés'), v.t. pret. & pp. released; ppr. releasing. [O.E. releas, releas, to release, to relax, from O.Fr. releaser, relaisser, to release, to relinquish—prefix re-, and laisser, to leave; It. lasciare; O.It. lassare; from lassare, to loosen, from lassus, loose, lax. Release, relax, and relax are thus the same word.] 1. To let loose again; to set free from restraint or confinement; to liberate, as from prison, confinement, or servitude. Mark xv. 2. "Release me from my hands." Shak.

*You releas'd his courage, and set free
A valour fatal to the enemy.* Dryden.

2. To free from pain, care, trouble, grief, or any other evil.—3. To free from obligation or penalty; as, to release one from debt, from a promise or covenant.—4. To quit; to let go, as a legal claim; to remit; to discharge or relinquish, as a right to lands or tenements, by conveying it to another that has some right or estate in possession, as when the person in remainder releases his right to the tenant in possession, when one coparcener releases his right to the other, or the mortgagee releases his claim to the mortgagor.

Item, that the duchy of Anjou and the county of Maine shall be released and delivered to the king her father. Shak.

5. To relax. Hooker.—SYN. To free, liberate, loose, discharge, quit, acquit.

Release (ré-lés'), n. 1. Liberation or discharge from restraint of any kind, as from confinement or bondage. "Release from hell." Milton.—2. Liberation from care, pain, or any burden.

*It seem'd so hard at first, mother, to leave the blessed sun,
And now it seems as hard to stay, and yet His will be done!*

But still I think it can't be long before I find release. Tennyson.

3. Discharge from obligation or responsibility, as from debt, penalty, or claim of any kind; acquittance.

The king made a great feast, . . . and he made a release to the provinces, and gave gifts. Est. ii. 18.

4. In law, properly, a discharge of a right; an instrument in writing by which estates, rights, titles, entries, actions, and other things are extinguished and discharged, and sometimes transferred, abridged, or enlarged; and in general it signifies a person's giving up or discharging the right or action he has or claims to have against another or his lands.—5. In the steam-engine, the opening of the exhaust-port before the stroke is finished, to lessen the back-pressure.

Re-lease (ré-lés'), v.t. [Prefix re-, and lease.] To lease again or anew.

Releasee (ré-lés'-é), n. In law, a person to whom a release is given; a releasee.

Releasement (ré-lés'-ment), n. The act of releasing, as from confinement or obligation. "Releasement from all evils." Milton.

Releaser (ré-lés'-ér), n. One who releases. "Of evils thou the chief and best releaser." Heywood.

Releasor (ré-lés'-or), n. In law, one who grants a release; one who quits or renounces that which he has; a releasor.

Release, n. Release. Chaucer.

Relief, n. That which is left. Chaucer.

Religate (rel-é-gat'), v.t. pret. & pp. religated; ppr. religating. [L. religio, religatum, to send away, to banish, to remove—re-, back, and lego, to send.] 1. To send away or out of the way; to consign to some obscure or remote destination; to banish.

We have not religated religion like something we were ashamed to show to obscure municipalities or rustic villages. Burke.

When Mr. Disraeli was religated to the cold shade of Opposition in 1868, he consoled himself by writing a novel. Saturday Review.

2. To send into exile; to cause to remove a certain distance from Rome for a certain period; a term in Roman law.

Religation (rel-é-gá'shon), n. [L. religatio.] The act of religating; banishment; specifcally, a term in ancient Roman law. See RELIGATE, 2.

Relent (ré-lent'), v.i. [Fr. relentir, to slacken, to abate, to grow cool—prefix re-, and alentir, from a-, to, and lent, L. lentus, pliant, flexible, slow; akin to lenis, soft, smooth, pliant. See LENIENT.] 1. To soften in substance; to lose compactness; to become less rigid or hard.

In some houses, sweetmeats will relent more than in others. Bacon.

*When opening buds salute the welcome day,
And earth relenting feels the genial ray.* Pope.

2. To deliquesce; to dissolve; to melt.

Crows seem to call upon rain, which is but the comfort they seem to receive in the relenting of the air. Bacon.

Salt of tartar, brought to fusion and placed in a cellar, will . . . begin to relent. Boyle.

3. To become less intense; to relax. Sir K. Digby [Kare.]—4. To become less harsh, cruel, or obdurate; to soften in temper; to become more mild and tender; to give way; to yield; to comply; to feel compassion. "Relent and yield to mercy." Shak.

Fierce Andronicus would not relent. Shak.

*Stern Proserpine relenting,
And gave him back the fair.* Pope.

Relent (ré-lent'), v.t. 1. To slacken; to remit; to stay; to abate. "And oftentimes he would relent his pace." Spenser.—2. To soften; to mollify; to dissolve.

*Thou art a pearl which nothing can relent
But vinegar made of devotion's tears.* Davies.

Relent (ré-lent'), n. Remission; stay.

She came without relent unto the land of Amazons. Spenser.

Relentless (ré-lent'-les), a. Incapable of relenting; unmoved by pity; unyielding; insensible to the distresses of others; destitute of tenderness; as, a prey to relentless despotism.

*For this th' avenging power employs his darts . . .
Thus will persist, relentless in his fra.* Dryden.

SYN. Unrelenting, implacable, unyielding, unmerciful, merciless, pitiless, cruel.

Relentlessly (ré-lent'-les-ly), adv. In a relentless manner; without pity.

Relentlessness (ré-lent'-les-ness), n. The quality of being relentless or unmoved by pity.

Relentment (ré-lent'-ment), n. The act or state of relenting; compassion.

Releasee (ré-lés'-é), n. In law, the person to whom a release is executed.

Releasor (ré-lés'-or), n. In law, the person who executes a release.

There must be a privity of estate between the releasor and releasee. Blackstone.

Relief (ré-lé'), v.t. To let anew, as a house.

Relevance, Relevancy (rel'-evans, rel'-ev-an-si), n. [See RELEVANT.] 1. The state of affording relief or aid.—2. The state or character of being relevant or bearing on the matter in hand; pertinence; applicableness; as, your argument has no relevance to the case.

Much I marvelled this ungrainly fowl to hear discourse so plainly.

Though its answer little meaning—little relevancy bore. Pope.

3. In Scots law, fitness or sufficiency to bring about a decision. The relevance of the libel, in Scots law, is the justice and sufficiency of the matters therein stated, to warrant a decree in the terms asked. The relevance of the defence is the justice of the allegation therein made to elide the conclusion of the libel, and to warrant a decree of absolvitor.

Relevant (rel'-evant), a. [Fr. relevé, ppr. relevant. See RELIEVE.] 1. Relieving; lending aid or support. Hence—2. To the purpose; pertinent; applicable; as, the testimony is not relevant to the case.

Close and relevant arguments have very little hold on the passions. Sydney Smith.

3. In Scots law, sufficient to support the cause; applied to a plea which is well founded in point of law, provided it be true in fact. SYN. Pertinent, applicable, apposite, appropriate, suitable, fit.

Relevantly (rel'-evant-ly), adv. In a relevant manner.

Relevation (rel'-é-vá'shon), n. A raising or lifting up.

Reliability (ré-lí'a-bil'-i-ti), n. The state or quality of being reliable; reliableness. Coleridge.

Reliable (ré-lí'a-bl), a. Such as may be relied on; fit or worthy to be relied on; to be depended on. This word has been again and again attacked by different writers, having been at various times stigmatized as an Americanism, as irregular in formation, as unnecessary, as vulgar, and what not. Against such charges, however, it has found able defenders, the most notable of whom is Mr. Fitzedward Hall, in his little work On English Adjectives in -able, with Special Reference to Reliable. The first instance of its use as known to him was in a paper written by Coleridge to the Morning Post in 1800, the expression in which it occurs being 'the best means, and most reliable pledge.' Coleridge used it repeatedly afterwards; and it has also been used by many good writers since. It is now, indeed, of everyday occurrence, though no doubt certain persons still object to the use of it. Among those who have employed it Mr. Hall mentions Rev. James Martineau, Mr. Gladstone, Dr. Newman, Mr. John Stuart Mill, Dr. Henry Maudslay, Bishop Wilberforce, Dean Mansel, Harriet Martineau, and Mr. Leslie Stephen—names surely sufficient to support any one who chooses to use the vocable in question. That it is unnecessary is not quite the fact, at least we can hardly admit that its place is already sufficiently occupied by trustworthy or trusty as is usually stated.

'If these were true,' says Mr. Hall, 'inasmuch as we have trust, verb and substantive, there would be no need of rely and reliance: they must be wholly superfluous. But we rely where we look for support; we trust where we apprehend no deception; and reliable and trustworthy or trusty, properly employed, are no less different than their respective verbs. In corollary to this, rely except metaphorically, has not a personal reference, whereas trust has; and the best writers who have hitherto practically accepted reliable, have applied it to things solely. That many persons use reliable instead of trustworthy is, of course, no ground for rejecting it.' That it is formed after a somewhat uncommon model is also no sufficient ground for rejecting it, when we find in good use such words as available, such as one may avail one's self of; conversible, such as may be conversed with; dispensable, that may be dispensed with, and similarly indispensable; laughable, worthy of being laughed at, and sundry others. Altogether it seems too late in the day to protest against the use of the word now; those who do not like it can let it alone; but as Professor Whitney remarks (the quotation is from Mr. Hall):—'We have had to swallow too many linguistic camels, to want to make life more uncomfortable by straining at such gnats as that.'

According to General Livingston's humorous account, his own village of Elizabethtown was not much more reliable, being peopled in those agitated times by unknown, unrecommended strangers, gaily-looking Tories, and very knavish Whigs. Living.

He (Mr. Grote) seems to think that the reliable chronology of Greece begins before its reliable history. Gladstone.

Above all, the grand and only reliable security, in the last resort, against the despotism of the government, is in that case wanting—the sympathy of the army with the people. J. S. Mill.

The sturdy peasant . . . has become very well accustomed to that spectacle, and regards the said lord as his most reliable source of trinkets and other pecuniary advantages. Leslie Stephen.

Reliability (ré-lí'a-bil'-ness), n. The state or quality of being reliable; reliability.

But the number of steps in an argument does not subtract from its reliableness, if no new premises of an uncertain character are taken up by the way. J. S. Mill.

I remember . . . being very much struck with the way in which people in Austrian Croatia talked of the truthfulness and reliableness of their Turkish neighbours. Grant Duff.

Reliably (ré-lí'a-blí), adv. In a reliable manner; so as to be relied on.

Reliance (ré-lí'ans), n. [From rely, reliant.] 1. The act of relying, or the state or quality of being reliant; confident rest for support; confidence; dependence; as, we may have perfect reliance on the promises of God; to have reliance on the testimony of witnesses.

"Reliance on the divine mercies." Richardson. "In reliance on promises which proved to be of very little value." Macaulay.

Those, in whom he had reliance
For his noble name,
With one smile of still defiance
Sold him into shame. Tennyson.

2. Anything on which to rely; sure dependence; ground of trust.

Reliant (ré-lí'ant), a. Having or indicating reliance or confidence; confident; self-reliant; as, a reliant spirit; a reliant bearing.

Relic (rel'ik), n. (Older relicus, from Fr. relique; L. reliquia, remains—re-, back, and lingo, to leave, from root lig, akin to li; in by blood or alliance, particularly by consanguinity; as, a person related in the first or second degree.—3. Standing in some relation or connection; as, the arts of painting and sculpture are closely related.—4. In music, same as Relative.

Relatedness (ré-lâ-ted-nes), n. The state or condition of being related; affinity. Synonym.

Relater (ré-lâ-tér), n. One who relates, recites, or narrates; an historian. 'A tedious relater of facts.' Swift.

Relation (ré-lâ-shon), n. [L. relatio, relationis, from refero, relatum. See RELATE.] 1. The act of relating or telling, or that which is related or told; recital; account; narration; narrative of facts; as, an historical relation; we listened to the relation of his adventures.—2. Respect; reference; regard; generally or always in the phrase in relation to.

I have been importuned to make some observations on this art, in relation to its agreement with poetry. Dryden.

3. Connection perceived or imagined between things; a certain position occupied by one thing with regard to another; the condition of being such or such in respect to something else; as, the relation of a citizen to the state; the relation of a subject to the supreme authority; the relation of husband to wife, or of master to servant.

Any sort of connection which is perceived or imagined between two or more things, or any comparison which is made by the mind, is a relation. Dr. Taylor.

Although relations are not real entities, but merely mental modes of viewing things, let it be observed that our ideas of relation are not vague nor arbitrary, but are determined by the known qualities of the related objects. Fleming.

4. Connection by consanguinity or affinity; kinship; tie of birth or marriage; relationship.

Relations dear, and all the charities
Of father, son, and brother, first were known. Milton.

Are we not to pity and supply the poor though they have no relation to us? . . . the gospel stills them all our brethren. Bp. Sprat.

5. A person connected by consanguinity or affinity; a kinsman or kinswoman.

A she-cousin, of a good family and small fortune, passed months among all her relations. Swift.

6. In math. ratio; proportion. The term is sometimes used in a more general sense in reference to two quantities which have something in common by means of which they may be compared, or indicating any dependence of one quantity upon another.

7. In logic, one of the ten predicaments or accidents belonging to substance.—8. In arch. the direct conformity to each other, and to the whole, of the different parts of a building.—9. In law, (a) where two different times or other things are accounted as one, and by some act done, the thing subsequent is said to take effect by relation from the time preceding. (b) The act of a relator at whose instance an information is filed. See RELATOR.—Inharmonious relation, in music, a term denoting that a dissonant sound is introduced which was not heard in the preceding chord.—SYN. Recital, rehearsal, narration, account, narrative, tale, detail, description, kindred, consanguinity, affinity, kinsman, kinswoman.

Relational (ré-lâ-shon-âl), a. 1. Having relation or kindred.

We might be tempted to take these two nations for relational stems. Tooke.

2. Indicating or specifying some relation: used in contradistinction to notional; as, a relational part of speech. The pronoun, preposition, and conjunction are relational parts of speech.

Relationist (ré-lâ-shon-ist), n. A relative; a relation. Sir T. Browne.

Relationship (ré-lâ-shon-ship), n. The state of being related by kindred, affinity, or other alliance.

Relative (rel'a-tiv), a. [Fr. relatif, L. relativus, from refero. See RELATE.] 1. Having relation to or bearing on something; close in connection; pertinent; relevant; as, the arguments may be good, but they are not relative to the subject. 'Grounds more relative than this.' Shak.—2. Not absolute or existing by itself; considered as belonging to or respecting something else; depending on or incident to relation.

Everything sustains both an absolute and a relative capacity; an absolute, as it is so, a thing, endued with such a nature; and a relative, as it is a part of the universe, and so stands in such a relation to the whole. South.

Relative rights of persons are incident to them as members of society, and standing in various relations to each other. Blackstone.

3. In gram. applied to a word which relates to another word, sentence, or part of a sentence called the antecedent; as, the relative pronouns who, which, and that.—4. In music, relative chord, a common chord made up of notes taken from the scale; as the chords of D minor, E minor, F major, G major, and A minor are relative to the chord or scale of C, these being the only common chords which can be made from the scale of C.—Relative key, a key whose tonic chord is a relative chord; that is, a key whose first, third, and fifth degrees form a common chord made up of notes of the key to which it is related.—Relative mode, in music, the mode which the composer interweaves with the principal mode in the flow of the harmony.—Relative chronology, in geol., the geological method of computing time, as opposed to the absolute or historical method.—Relative gravity. The same as Specific Gravity.—Relative motion, the change of the relative place of a moving body with respect to some other body also in motion.—Relative place, that part of space which is considered with regard to other adjacent objects.—Relative terms, in logic, terms which imply relation, as guardian and ward, master and servant, husband and wife.—Relative time, the sensible measure of any part of duration by means of motion.

Relative (rel'a-tiv), n. 1. Something considered in its relation to something else; one of two things having a certain relation. 2. A person connected by blood or affinity; especially, one allied by blood; a relation; a kinsman or kinswoman.

Our friends and relatives stand weeping by,
Dissolv'd in tears to see us die. Pemfret.

3. In gram. a word which relates to or represents another word, called its antecedent, or refers back to a sentence or member of a sentence, or to a series of sentences, constituting its antecedent; a relative pronoun. 'He seldom lives frugally who lives by chance.' Here who is the relative, which represents he, the antecedent. 'Judas declared him innocent, which he could not be, had he deceived his disciples.' Porteus. Here which refers to innocent, an adjective, as its antecedent. 'Another reason that makes me doubt of any innate practical principles is, that I think there cannot any one moral rule be proposed whereof a man may not justly demand a reason, which would be perfectly ridiculous and absurd if they were innate, or so much as self-evident, which every innate principle must needs be.' Locke. Here the first which refers to the demanding of a reason, the second to self-evident.—4. In logic, a relative term. See the adjective.

Relatively (rel'a-tiv-ly), adv. In a relative manner; in relation or respect to something else; with relation to each other and to other things; not absolutely; comparatively: often followed by to; as, his expenditure in charity was large relatively to his income.

Consider the absolute affections of any being as it is in itself before you consider it relatively. Hant.

Relativeness (rel'a-tiv-nes), n. The state of being relative or having relation.

Relativity (rel'a-tiv'i-ti), n. Relativeness. Coleridge. [Rare.]

Relator (ré-lâ-tér), n. 1. One who relates; a rehearser; a narrator or reciter. 'The several relators of this history.' Fuller.—2. In law, a private person at whose instance an information is allowed to be filed, and in whose behalf certain writs are issued; a prosecutor.

Relatrix (ré-lâ-triks), n. In law, a female relator or petitioner. Story.

Relax (ré-laks'), v.t. [L. relaxo, to loosen, to slacken, to relax—re, back, again, and lazo, to loosen, to widen, from laxus, wide, loose, open (whence lax).] 1. To slacken; to make less tense or rigid; to loosen; to make less close or firm; as, to relax a rope or cord; to relax the muscles or sinews.

Horror chill
Ran through his veins, and all his joints relax'd. Milton.

Some good survivor with his flute would go
Piping a ditty sad for Bon's fate,
And cross the supermuted ferry's flow,
And relax Pluto's brow. Matt. Arnold.

2. To make less severe or rigorous; to remit or abate in strictness; as, to relax a law or rule of justice.

The statute of mortmain was at several times relaxed by the legislature. Swift.

3. To remit or abate in respect to attention, assiduity, effort, or labour; to unbend; as, to relax study; to relax exertions or efforts. 4. To relieve from attention or effort. To afford a relaxation to; as, conversation relaxes the mind of the student.—5. To relieve from constipation; to loosen; to open; as, medicines relax the bowels. [In the following quotation the word is used in the peculiar sense of to hand or turn over to.]

The whole number of convicts amounted to thirty of whom sixteen were reconciled, and the relax'd of relaxed to the secular arm; in other words, turned over to the civil magistrate for execution. Pringle.

SYN. To slacken, loosen, loose, remit, abate, mitigate, ease, unbend, divert.

Relax (ré-laks'), v.i. 1. To become loose, feeble, or languid. 'His knees relax with toil.' Pope.—2. To abate in severity; to become more mild or less rigorous.

In others she relax'd again,
And govern'd with a looser rein. Prior.

3. To remit in close attention; to unbend; as, it is useful for the student to relax often and give himself to exercise and amusements.

Relax't (ré-laks'), n. Relaxation.

Labours and cares may have their relaxers and recreations. Fellham.

Relax't (ré-laks'), a. Relaxed; loose. Bacon.

Relaxable (ré-laks'a-bl), a. Capable of being relaxed or remitted. Barrow.

Relaxant (ré-laks'ant), n. A medicine that relaxes or opens.

Relaxation (ré-laks-shon), n. [L. relaxatio, relaxationis. See RELAX.] 1. The act of relaxing, or the state of being relaxed; as, (a) a diminution of tension, closeness, or firmness; as, a relaxation of the muscles, fibres, or nerves; specifically, in pathol. a looseness; a diminution of the natural and healthy tone of parts. (b) Remission or abatement of rigour. 'Abatements and relaxations of the laws of Christ.' Waterland. (c) Remission of attention or application; as, relaxation of efforts.—2. The act of recreating or refreshing; recreation; a state or occupation intended to give mental or bodily relief after effort. 'Proper relaxations in business.' Addison. 'Hours of careless relaxation.' Mansel.

But relaxation of the languid frame
By soft recumbency of outstretch'd limbs
Was bliss reserved for happier days. Cropper.

—Letters of relaxation, in Scots law, letters passing the signet, whereby a debtor was relieved from the horn, that is, from personal diligence. Such letters are not now employed in civil cases, but in criminal prosecutions. One who has been outlawed may apply to the court of justiciary for letters of relaxation reposing him against the sentence.

Relaxative (ré-laks'a-tiv), a. Having the quality of relaxing; laxative.

Relaxative (ré-laks'a-tiv), n. 1. That which has power to relax; a laxative medicine. 'You must use relaxatives.' B. Jonson.—2. What gives relaxation; a relaxation.

The Moresco festivals seem . . . as relaxations of corporeal labours. L. Addison.

Relay (ré-lâ'), n. [Fr. relate, a relay of horses; originally, relief or release; L. relaxus—L. re, and laxus, loose. See RELAX.]

1. A supply of anything laid up or kept in store for affording relief from time to time, or at successive stages. 'Who call aloud . . . for change of follies and relays of joy.' Young. Specifically, (a) a supply of horses placed on the road to be in readiness to relieve others, that a traveller may proceed without delay. (b) In hunting, a fresh set of dogs or horses, or both, placed in readiness at certain places, in case the game comes that way, to be cast off, or to mount the hunters in lieu of the horses already weary. (c) A squad of men to take a spell or turn of work at stated intervals; a shift. 2. In electric teleg. a subsidiary electro-magnetic circuit made and broken by the primary circuit. By means of an apparatus consisting of a magnet, armature, lever, &c., a current too feeble to produce sensible mechanical effects at a distance is made to set in action an auxiliary current competent for the work. Except by a battery of enormous power, currents of efficient strength can only be sent on short circuits in land telegraph lines, generally less than 50 miles, as the loss by leakage on the way is very considerable. On lines of greater length, which otherwise could not be worked from end to end, relays are therefore introduced.

at intermediate points. The analogy of this use of the apparatus to change of horses on a long journey is the origin of the name. Relays are also used in connection with alarms, when these are large and powerful. — Relay of ground, ground laid up in fallow. C. Richardson.

Relay (ré-lâ'), v.t. To lay again; to lay a second time; as, to relay a pavement.

Relbun (rel'bun), n. The roots of Calceolaria arachnoides, largely used for dyeing woollen cloth crimson. See CALCEOLARIA.

Releasable (ré-lâs'a-bl), a. Capable of being released. Soldan.

Release (ré-lâs'), v.t. pres. & pp. released; ppr. releasing. [O.E. releas, releas, to release, to relax, from O.Fr. releaser, relaisier, to release, to relinquish; prefix re, and laisier, to leave; it. lasciare; O.It. lassare; from l. lassare, to loosen, from lassus, loose, lax. Release, relax, and relax are thus the same word.] 1. To let loose again; to set free from restraint or confinement; to liberate, as from prison, confinement, or servitude. Mark xv. 2. 'Release me from my hands.' Shak.

Thou releasest his courage, and set free
A valour fatal to the enemy. Dryden.

2. To free from pain, care, trouble, grief, or any other evil. — 3. To free from obligation or penalty; as, to release one from debt, from a promise or covenant. — 4. To quit; to let go, as a legal claim; to remit; to discharge or relinquish, as a right to lands or tenements, by conveying it to another that has some right or estate in possession, as when the person in remainder releases his right to the tenant in possession, when one coparcener releases his right to the other, or the mortgagee releases his claim to the mortgagor.

Item, that the duchy of Anjou and the county of Maine shall be released and delivered to the king her father. Shak.

5. To relax. Hooker. — SYN. To free, liberate, loose, discharge, quit, acquit.

Release (ré-lâs'), n. 1. Liberation or discharge from restraint of any kind, as from confinement or bondage. 'Release from hell.' Milton. — 2. Liberation from care, pain, or any burden.

It seem'd so hard at first, mother, to leave the blessed sun,
And now it seems as hard to stay, and yet His will be done!

But still I think it can't be long before I find release. Tennyson.

3. Discharge from obligation or responsibility, as from debt, penalty, or claim of any kind; acquittance.

The king made a great feast, . . . and he made a release to the provinces, and gave gifts. Est. ii. 18.

4. In law, properly, a discharge of a right; an instrument in writing by which estates, rights, titles, entries, actions, and other things are extinguished and discharged, and sometimes transferred, abridged, or enlarged; and in general it signifies a person's giving up or discharging the right or action he has or claims to have against another or his lands. — 5. In the steam-engine, the opening of the exhaust-port before the stroke is finished, to lessen the back-pressure.

Re-lease (ré-lâs'), v.t. [Prefix re, and lease.] To lease again or anew.

Releasee (ré-lâs'-é), n. In law, a person to whom a release is given; a releasee.

Releasement (ré-lâs'-ment), n. The act of releasing, as from confinement or obligation. 'Releasement from all evils.' Milton.

Releaser (ré-lâs'-ér), n. One who releases. 'Of evils thou the chief and best releaser.' Heywood.

Releasor (ré-lâs'-or), n. In law, one who grants a release; one who quits or renounces that which he has; a releasor.

Religate (rel-é-gât'), v.t. pres. & pp. religating; ppr. religating. [L. religare, religatum, to send away, to banish, to remove — re, back, and lego, to send.] 1. To send away or out of the way; to consign to some obscure or remote destination; to banish.

We have not religated religion (like something we were ashamed to show) to obscure municipalities or rustic villages.

When Mr. Disraeli was religated to the cold shade of Opposition in 1868, he consoled himself by writing a novel. Scotsman newspaper.

2. To send into exile; to cause to remove a certain distance from Rome for a certain period; a term in Roman law.

Religation (rel-é-gâ'shon), n. [L. religatio.] The act of religating; banishment; specifcally, a term in ancient Roman law. See RELIGATE, 2.

Relent (ré-lent'), v.t. [Fr. ralentir, to slacken, to abate, to grow cool — prefix re, and alentir, from a, to, and lent, L. lentus, pliant, flexible, slow; akin to lenis, soft, smooth, pliant. See LENIENT.] 1. To soften in substance; to lose compactness; to become less rigid or hard.

In some houses, sweetmeats will relent more than in others. Bacon.

When op'ning buds salute the welcome day,
And earth relenting feels the genial ray. Pope.

2. To deliquesce; to dissolve; to melt.

Crows seem to call upon rain, which is but the comfort they seem to receive in the relenting of the air. Bacon.

Salt of tartar, brought to fusion and placed in a cellar, will . . . begin to relent. Boyle.

3. To become less intense; to relax. Str. K. Drigby [Kare]. 4. To become less harsh, cruel, or obdurate; to soften in temper; to become more mild and tender; to give way; to yield; to comply; to feel compassion. 'Relent and yield to mercy.' Shak.

Fierce Andronicus would not relent. Shak.

Stern Proserpine *relent*ed. Pope.

Relent (ré-lent'), v.t. 1. To slacken; to remit; to stay; to abate. 'And oftentimes he would relent his pace.' Spenser. — 2. To soften; to mollify; to dissolve.

Thou art a pearl which nothing can relent
But vinegar made of devotion's tears. Davies.

Relent (ré-lent'), n. Remission; stay.

She came without relent unto the land of Anaxoras. Spenser.

Relentless (ré-lent'-les), a. Incapable of relenting; unmoved by pity; un pitying; insensible to the distresses of others; destitute of tenderness; as, a prey to relentless despotism.

For this th' avenging power employs his darts . . .
Thus will persist, relentless in his ire. Dryden.

Str. Unrelenting, implacable, unpitying, unmerciful, merciless, pitiless, cruel.

Relentlessly (ré-lent'-les-ly), adv. In a relentless manner; without pity.

Relentlessness (ré-lent'-les-ness), n. The quality of being relentless or unmoved by pity.

Relentment (ré-lent'-ment), n. The act or state of relenting; compassion.

Releasee (ré-lâs'-é), n. In law, the person to whom a release is executed.

Releasor (ré-lâs'-or), n. In law, the person who executes a release.

There must be a privacy of estate between the releasor and releasee. Blackstone.

Relat (ré-lét'), v.t. To let anew, as a house.

Relevance, Relevancy (rel'é-vans, rel'é-van-si), n. [See RELEVANT.] 1. The state of affording relief or aid. — 2. The state or character of being relevant or bearing on the matter in hand; pertinence; applicableness; as, your argument has no relevance to the case.

Much I marvelled this ungainly fowl to hear discourse so plainly,
Though its answer little meaning — little relevancy bore. Pope.

3. In Scots law, fitness or sufficiency to bring about a decision. The relevancy of the libel, in Scots law, is the justice and sufficiency of the matters therein stated, to warrant a decree in the terms asked. The relevancy of the defence is the justice of the allegation therein made to elide the conclusion of the libel, and to warrant a decree of absolvitor.

Relevant (rel'é-vant'), a. [Fr. relevé, ppr. relevant. See RELIEVE.] 1. Relieving; lending aid or support. Hence — 2. To the purpose; pertinent; applicable; as, the testimony is not relevant to the case.

Close and relevant arguments have very little hold on the passions. Sydney Smith.

3. In Scots law, sufficient to support the cause; applied to a plea which is well founded in point of law, provided it be true in fact.

Str. Pertinent, applicable, apposite, appropriate, suitable, fit.

Relevantly (rel'é-vant'-ly), adv. In a relevant manner.

Relevation (rel-é-vâ'shon), n. A raising or lifting up.

Reliability (ré-lâ-bi-lî-ti'), n. The state or quality of being reliable; reliability. Coleridge.

Reliable (ré-lâ-bi'), a. Such as may be relied on; fit or worthy to be relied on; to be depended on. This word has been again and again attacked by different writers, having been at various times stigmatized as an Americanism, as irregular in formation, as unnecessary, as vulgar, and whatnot. Against such charges, however, it has found able defenders, the most notable of whom is Mr. Fitzward Hall, in his little work On English Adjectives in -able, with Special Reference to Reliable. The first instance of its use as known to him was in a paper written by Coleridge to the Morning Post in 1800, the expression in which it occurs being 'the best means, and most reliable pledge.' Coleridge used it repeatedly afterwards; and it has also been used by many good writers since. It is now, indeed, of everyday occurrence, though no doubt certain persons still object to the use of it. Among those who have employed it Mr. Hall mentions Rev. James Martineau, Mr. Gladstone, Dr. Newman, Mr. John Stuart Mill, Dr. Henry Maudslay, Bishop Wilberforce, Dean Mansel, Harriet Martineau, and Mr. Leslie Stephen — names surely sufficient to support any one who chooses to use the vocable in question. That it is unnecessary is not quite the fact, at least we can hardly admit that its place is already sufficiently occupied by trustworthy or trusty as is usually stated. 'If this were true,' says Mr. Hall, 'inasmuch as we have trust, verb and substantive, there would be no need of rely and reliance: they must be wholly superfluous. But we rely where we look for support; we trust where we apprehend no deception; and reliable and trustworthy or trusty, properly employed, are no less different than their respective verbs. In corollary to this, rely except metaphorically, has not a personal reference, whereas trust has; and the best writers who have hitherto practically accepted reliable, have applied it to things solely. That many persons use reliable instead of trustworthy, is, of course, no ground for rejecting it.' That it is formed after a somewhat uncommon model is also no sufficient ground for rejecting it, when we find in good use such words as available, such as one may avail one's self of; conversible, such as may be conversed with; dispensable, that may be dispensed with, and similarly indispensable; laughable, worthy of being laughed at; and sundry others. Altogether it seems too late in the day to protest against the use of the word now; those who do not like it can let it alone; but as Professor Whitney remarks (the quotation is from Mr. Hall): 'We have had to swallow too many linguistic camels, to want to make life more uncomfortable by straining at such gnats as that.'

According to General Livingston's humorous account, his own village of Ellanabtown was not much more reliable, being peopled in those agitated times by unknown, unrecommended strangers, glib-looking Tories, and very knavish Whigs. J. Irving.

He (Mr. Grote) seems to think that the reliable chronology of Greece begins before its reliable history. Gladstone.

Above all, the grand and only reliable security, in the last resort, against the despotism of the government, is in that case wanting — the sympathy of the army with the people. J. S. Mill.

The sturdy peasant . . . has become very well accustomed to that spectacle, and regards the sordid lord as his most reliable source of trinkets and other pecuniary advantages. Leslie Stephen.

Reliability (ré-lâ-bi-lî-ty), n. The state or quality of being reliable; reliability.

But the number of steps in an argument does not subtract from its reliableness, if no new premises of an uncertain character are taken up by the way. J. S. Mill.

I remember . . . being very much struck with the way in which people in Austrian Croatia talked of the truthfulness and reliableness of their Turkish neighbours. Grant Duff.

Reliably (ré-lâ-bi-ly), adv. In a reliable manner; so as to be relied on.

Reliance (ré-lâns'), n. [From rely, reliant.] 1. The act of relying, or the state or quality of being reliant; confident rest for support; confidence; dependence; as, we may have perfect reliance on the promises of God; to have reliance on the testimony of witnesses.

'Reliance on the divine mercies.' Richardson. 'In reliance on promises which proved to be of very little value.' Macaulay.

Those, in whom he had reliance
For his noble name
With one smile of self defiance
Sold him into shame. Tennyson.

2. Anything on which to rely; sure dependence; ground of trust.

Reliant (ré-lânt'), a. Having or indicating reliance or confidence; confident; self-reliant; as, a reliant spirit; a reliant bearing.

Relic (rel'ik), n. (Older relicue, from Fr. relique; L. reliquiae, remains — re, back, and linguo, to leave, from root lig, akin to lig; in Religion (rē-lī'jōn), n. [Fr. religion, from L. religio, religiosus, religion, piety, conscientiousness, scrupulousness, from religio, to bind back—re, back, and ligo, ligare, to bind, to bind together. Others derive religio from religere, to gather, to collect, making the primary meaning a collection, and then more specifically a collection of religious formulae.] 1. The feeling of reverence which men entertain towards a Supreme Being or to any order of beings conceived by them as demanding reverence from the possession of superhuman control over the destiny of man or the powers of nature; the recognition of God as an object of worship, love, and obedience; right feeling towards God as rightly apprehended; piety. Religion, as distinguished from morality, denotes the influences and motives to human duty which are found in the character and will of God, while morality is concerned with man's duty to his fellow. As distinguished from theology, religion is subjective, designating the feelings and acts of men which relate to God, while theology is objective, and denotes those ideas or conceptions which man entertains respecting the God whom he worships, especially his reasoned and systematized ideas concerning God.

It will be easily perceived that religion means at least two very different things. When we speak of the Jewish, or the Christian, or the Hindu religion, we mean a body of doctrines handed down by tradition, or in canonical books, and containing all that constitutes the faith of Jew, Christian, or Hindu. Using religion in that sense, we may say that a man has changed his religion, that is, that he has adopted the Christian instead of the Brahmanical body of religious doctrines, just as a man may learn to speak English instead of Hindustani. But religion is also used in a different sense. As there is a faculty of speech, independent of all the historical forms of language, so we may speak of a faculty of faith in man, independent of all historical religions. If we say that it is religion which distinguishes man from the animal, we do not mean the Christian or Jewish religion only, we do not mean any special religion, but we mean a mental faculty, that faculty which, independent of, nay, in spite of, sense and reason, enables man to apprehend the Infinite under different names, and under varying disguises. Without that faculty, no religion, not even the lowest worship of idols and fetiches, would be possible; and if we will but listen attentively we can hear in all religions a groaning of the spirit, a struggle to conceive the inconceivable, to utter the unutterable, a longing after the Infinite, a love of God.

Max Müller.

2. Any system of faith and worship; as, the religion of the Greeks, Jews, Hindus, Mohammedans, Christians, &c. See extract above. 3. † The rites or services of religion; the practice of sacred rites and ceremonies. 'Gay religions full of pomp and gold.' Milton. — Established religion, that form of religion in a country which is recognized and sanctioned by the state, in distinction from other forms, and to which certain privileges and distinctions are attached. — Natural religion, the knowledge of God and of our duty which is derived from the light of nature or of the unaided reason. — Revealed religion, the knowledge of God and of our duty which comes to us from positive revelation. — To get religion, to be converted: a term in use among certain religious sects in the United States.

Religion, Devotion, Piety, Sanctity. Religion is what binds men to God, and is often external. Devotion is the state in which men vow to be obedient to him: it always implies the internal subjection of the man to God. Piety is the filial sentiment which we cherish to Him as our Father. Sanctity is the habitual holiness which a sense of his law and character inspires.

August.

Religionary (rē-lī'jōn-ə-rī), a. Relating to religion; pious. 'Religionary professions.' Ep. Barlow.

As distinguished from theology, religion is subjective, designating the feelings and acts of men which relate to God, while theology is objective, and denotes those ideas or conceptions which man entertains respecting the God whom he worships, especially his reasoned and systematized ideas concerning God.

It will be easily perceived that religion means at least two very different things. When we speak of the Jewish, or the Christian, or the Hindu religion, we mean a body of doctrines handed down by tradition, or in canonical books, and containing all that constitutes the faith of Jew, Christian, or Hindu. Using religion in that sense, we may say that a man has changed his religion, that is, that he has adopted the Christian instead of the Brahmanical body of religious doctrines, just as a man may learn to speak English instead of Hindustani. But religion is also used in a different sense. As there is a faculty of speech, independent of all the historical forms of language, so we may speak of a faculty of faith in man, independent of all historical religions. If we say that it is religion which distinguishes man from the animal, we do not mean the Christian or Jewish religion only, we do not mean any special religion, but we mean a mental faculty, that faculty which, independent of, nay, in spite of, sense and reason, enables man to apprehend the Infinite under different names, and under varying disguises. Without that faculty, no religion, not even the lowest worship of idols and fetiches, would be possible; and if we will but listen attentively we can hear in all religions a groaning of the spirit, a struggle to conceive the inconceivable, to utter the unutterable, a longing after the Infinite, a love of God. Max Müller.

2. Any system of faith and worship; as, the religion of the Greeks, Jews, Hindus, Mohammedans, Christians, &c. See extract above.—3. The rites or services of religion; the practice of sacred rites and ceremonies. 'Gay religions full of pomp and gold.' Milton.—Established religion, that form of religion in a country which is recognized and sanctioned by the state, in distinction from other forms, and to which certain privileges and distinctions are attached.—Natural religion, the knowledge of God and of our duty which is derived from the light of nature or of the unaided reason.—Revealed religion, the knowledge of God and of our duty which comes to us from positive revelation.—To get religion, to be converted: a term in use among certain religious sects in the United States.

Religion, Devotion, Piety, Sanctity. Religion is what binds men to God, and is often external. Devotion is the state in which men vow to be obedient to him; it always implies the internal subjection of the man to God. Piety is the filial sentiment which we cherish to Him as our Father. Sanctity is the habitual holiness which a sense of his law and character inspires. Angus.

4 In sculpture, &c., the projection or prominence of a figure above or beyond the ground or plane on which it is formed. Relief is of three kinds: high relief (alto-relievo), low relief (basso-relievo), and middle or half relief (mezzo-relievo). The difference is in the degree of projection. High relief is that in which the figures project at least one-half of their apparent circumference from the back ground. Low relief is a representation of one or more figures, raised upon a flat surface or back ground, in such a manner, however, as that no part of them shall be entirely detached from it, as in medals, busts, intaglios, and other ornaments.

Low Relief

Middle or half relief is the third species between the other two - 3 In painting, the appearance of projection and solidity in represented objects, attained by skilful drawing or colouring so that they appear precisely as they are found in nature. 4 Prominence or distinctness given to anything by something presenting a contrast to it, or being brought into close relation with or proximity to it, as, the weakness of the present ministry brings the excellences of the former into strong relief.

10 Broken meat given in alms - 11 In feudal law, a fine or composition which the heir of a tenant, holding by knight's service or other tenure, paid to the lord at the death of the ancestor for the privilege of taking up the estate, which on strict feudal principles, had lapsed or fallen to the lord on the death of the tenant. This relief consisted of horses, arms, money, and the like, the amount of which was originally arbitrary, but afterward fixed at a certain rate by law. The term is still used in this sense in Scotch law being a sum payable by a feudal superior from the heir who enters on a fief, also called casualty of relief. In Scotch law it is also applied to the right of recovering money paid in certain cases, then if an heir pays a debt legally payable by an executor he has relief against the executor - Relief Church a body of presbyterians dissenters in Scotland, whose ground of separation from the Established Church was the violent exercise of lay patronage which obtained in the latter. Gillespie, its founder, was deposed by the General Assembly of the Established Church in 1756, and the first Relief presbytery met October 22, 1761. In 1847 the Relief and Secession Churches amalgamated and formed the United Presbyterian Church. See ALLEVIATION, MITIGATION, AID, HELP, SUCOUR, ASSISTANCE, REMEDY, REDRESS, INDEMNIFICATION.

There's not a soldier of an old, that, in the thanksgiving before meat, do relish the portion of that prayer for peace. Shak.

He knows how to prize his advantage and to relish the banquet which he enjoys. Hamlet.

3 To give an agreeable taste to, to impart a pleasing flavour to, to cause to taste agreeably. 'A savory bit that served to relish wine.' Dryden.

He said he always found that, when without dinner, they (pickled walnuts) relished the best. Hamlet.

4 To savour of, to have a smack or taste of, to have the mark or manner of.

To ordered walk, and relisheth the soldier. Shak. & P.

Relish (rē-lī-jən-sē) v. 1 To have a pleasing taste.

Their greatest delight would not relish to their palates. Hamlet.

2 To give pleasure.

Had I been the leader out of this court, it could not have relished among my other discourses. Shak.

3 To have a savour.

A theory which, how muchsoever it may relish of wit and invention, hath no foundation in nature. Woodward.

Relish (rē-lī-jən-sē) n. [See the verb.] 1 The sensation produced by anything on the palate; savour; taste; commonly a pleasing taste.

Sweet, bitter, sour, harsh, and salt are all the options we have in denoting that numerous variety of substance to be found distinct in the same place. Locke.

2 Inclination, taste, appreciation, fondness; liking, appetite generally used with for before the thing, sometimes with of, but the latter is ambiguous. 'Any relish for fine writing.' Alison. 'A relish of such reflections as improve the mind.' Alison. 'A relish for whatever was excellent in art or letters.' Macpherson. 3 That quality in an object which gives pleasure, the power of pleasing; hence, delight given by anything.

When liberty is gone,
Life grows insipid and has lost its relish. Alison.

4 Characteristic quality; savour, flavour, hence, sort; cast. 'His fears . . . of the same relish as ours are.' Shak.

It preserves some relish of old writing. Pope.

5 A small quantity just perceptible; tincture. 'Some cast that has no relish of cultivation in it.' Shak. 6 That which is used to impart a savour, especially, something taken with food to increase the pleasure of eating. -See Taste, savour, flavour, appetite, zest, gusto, liking, delight.

Relishable (rē-lī-jən-sē) a. Capable of being relished, having an agreeable taste.

lease, has allowed him to continue without making any new agreement.

Relodge (rē-lōj'), v.t. To lodge again. Southery.

Relover (rē-luv'), v.t. To love in return.

To own for him so familiar and leveling an affection as love, much more to expect to be reloved by him, were not the least saucy presumption man could be guilty of, did not his own commandments make it a duty. Bayle.

Relucens (rē-lū'sent), a. [L. relucens, relucens, ppr. of reluceo—re, back, and luceo, to shine.] 1. Throwing back light; shining; luminous; glittering.

Gorgeous banners to the sun expand
Their streaming volumes of relucens gold. Glover.

In brighter mazes, the relucens stream
Plays o'er the mead. Thomson.

2. Bright; shining; eminent. 'That college wherein piety and beneficence were relucens in despite of jealousies.' Bp. Hackett.

Reluctor (rē-lukt'), v.t. [L. reluctor—re, back, and luctor, to struggle.] To strive or struggle against anything; to make resistance.

We with studied mixtures force our relucting appetites, and with all the spells of epicurism, conjure them up, that we may lay them again. Dr. H. More.

Reluctance (rē-luk'tans), n. The state or quality of being reluctant; aversion; repugnance; unwillingness: often followed by to, though sometimes by against.

Aeneas, when forced in his own defence to kill Lausus, the poet shows compassionate, and tempering the severity of his looks with a reluctance to the action. Dryden.

Reluctance against God and his just yoke. Milton.

Reluctancy (rē-luk'tan-si), n. Same as Reluctance.

Beas witness, heav'n, with what reluctancy
Her helpless innocence I doom to die. Dryden.

Reluctant (rē-luk'tant), a. [L. reluctans, reluctans, ppr. of reluctor. See RELUCTOR.] 1. Striving against doing something; struggling or resisting with violence.

Down he fell
A monstrous serpent on his belly prone,
Reluctant, but in vain; a greater Power
Now ruled him. Milton.

2. Unwilling to do what one feels called on to do; acting with repugnance; averse; loth; as, he was very reluctant to go.

Reluctant now I touch'd the trembling string. Tickell.

3. Proceeding from an unwilling mind; granted with unwillingness; as, reluctant obedience.—Averse, Reluctant. See under VERSE.—SYN. Unwilling, loth, disinclined, averse, backward.

Reluctantly (rē-luk'tant-li), adv. In a reluctant manner; with opposition of heart; unwillingly; as, what is undertaken reluctantly is seldom well performed.

Reluctate (rē-luk'tāt), v.t. To hang back; to be reluctant; to struggle against. 'Delude their reluctating consciences.' Dr. H. More.

Reluctation (rē-luk'tā-shon), n. Reluctance; repugnance; resistance.

The king prevailed with the prince, though not without some reluctation. Bacon.

Relume (rē-lūm'), v.t. [See RELUMINE.] To rekindle; to light again.

Yet in thy heart what human sympathies,
What soft compassion glows, as in the skies
The tender stars their clouded lamps relume. Longfellow.

Relumine (rē-lū'min'), v.t. [L. relumino—re, again, and lumen, light, from luceo, to shine.] 1. To light anew; to rekindle. 'When the light of the Gospel was rellumined by the Reformation.' Bp. Louth.—2. To illuminate again. 'Time's rellumined river.' Hood.

Rely (rē-lī'), v.t. pret. & pp. relied; ppr. relying. [From old relie, rely, relye, lit. to rally, from L. re, again, and ligare, to bind. It seems to have been originally transitive, and to have been often used with reflexive pronouns. Fitzward Hall quotes from old authors such passages as: 'Those men who, fearing God, relied themselves upon his word' (1612); 'Not relying ourselves entirely upon him and his salvation' (Bp. Sanderson, 1681); whence the transition to the modern meaning is easy.] To rest with confidence, as when we are satisfied of the veracity, integrity, or ability of persons, or of the certainty of facts or of evidence; to have confidence in; to trust; to depend: with on or upon; as, to rely on the promise of a man who is known to be upright; to rely on the veracity or fidelity of a tried friend; to rely on the mercy and promises of God. 'Bade me rely on him as on my father.' Shak. 'As one relying on your lordship's will.' Shak.

Because thou hast relied on the king of Syria, and not relied on the Lord thy God; therefore is the host of the king of Syria escaped out of thine hand. 1 Chr. xvi. 7.

SYN. To trust, depend, confide, repose.

Remade (rē-mād'), pret. & pp. of remake.

Remain (rē-mān'), v.t. [O. Fr. remainder, remanoir, from L. remaneo—re, back, and maneo, manai, to remain, to stay (whence mansion).] 1. To continue in a place; to stay; to abide. 'He should have remained in the city of refuge.' Num. xxv. 28.—2. To continue in an unchanged form, state, or condition. 'Childless thou art, childless remain.' Milton.

If she depart, let her remain unmarried. 1 Cor. vii. 21.

3. To endure; to continue; to last.

For the upright shall dwell in the land, and the perfect shall remain in it. Prov. ii. 21.

4. To stay behind after others have gone; to be left after a part, quantity, or number has been taken away, removed or destroyed.

And all his fugitives with all his hands shall fall by the sword, and they that remain shall be scattered. Ezek. xvii. 21.

5. To be left as not included or comprised; to be still to deal with.

That a father may have some power over his children is easily granted; but that an elder brother has so over his brethren, remains to be seen. Lath.

Remain is used by Milton and others in some cases transitively:

The easier conquest now remains thee. Per. Last.

This, however, may be considered as elliptical for remains to thee, as remain is not properly a transitive verb.—SYN. To continue, stay, wait, tarry, rest, sojourn, dwell, abide, last, endure.

Remain (rē-mān'), n. 1.† State of remaining; stay; abide.

A most miraculous work in this good king,
Which, often, since my here-remain in England,
I've seen him do. Shak.

2.† That which is left to be done.

I know your master's pleasure and he mine;
All the remain is 'Welcome!' Shak.

3. That which is left; remainder; relic: chiefly used in the plural. 'Our little remains of victuals.' Sir J. Hawkins. ('Solomon's Proverbs') the most curious and valuable remain of ancient wisdom. Bp. Louth.

'When this remain of horror has entirely subsided.' Burke. 'Their small remains of life.' Pope.

Among the remains of old Rome the grandeur of the commonwealth shows itself chiefly in works that were either necessary or convenient. Addison.

Specifically.—4. That which is left of a human being after life is gone; a dead body; a corpse: now only used in the plural.

Be kind to my remains, and O, defend,
Against your judgment, your departed friend! Dryden.

5. pl. The productions, especially the literary works of one who is dead; posthumous works; as, Coleridge's Literary Remains.—Organic remains. See ORGANIC.

Remainder (rē-mān'dér), n. [An O. Fr. infinitive (see REMAIN, v.t.); comp. rejoinder.] 1. That which remains; anything left after the separation, removal, destruction, or passing of a part.

If these decoctions be repeated till the water comes off clear, the remainder yields no salt. Arbuthnot.

What madness moves you, matrons, to destroy
The last remainders of unhappy Troy. Dryden.

2. In arith., &c., the sum or quantity that is left after subtraction or after any deduction.

3. In law, an estate limited to take effect and be enjoyed after another estate, as a life interest, is determined. Thus, if the owner of the fee-simple or freehold of lands give them by will or deed to A for life, and after his decease to B and his heirs, the interest of B is termed the remainder, because, after deducting A's life estate, all that remains belongs to B. Remainders are either vested, contingent, or cross. Vested or executed remainders are those by which a present interest passes to the party, though it is to be enjoyed in future, and by which the estate is invariably fixed to remain to a determinate person after the particular estate is spent, as if A be tenant for years, remainder to B in fee: hereby B's remainder is vested, which nothing can defeat or set aside. Contingent remainders, otherwise called executory, are defined to be 'where the estate in remainder is limited to take effect either to an uncertain person, or upon an uncertain event; so that the particular estate may chance to be determined, and the remainder never take effect.' Cross remainder is where each of two grantees has reciprocally a remainder in the share of the other. Thus, if an estate be granted as to one half to A for life with remainder to his children in tail, with remainder to B in fee-simple; and as to the other half, to B for life with remainder to his children in tail, with remainder to A in fee-simple, these remainders are called cross remainders.—SYN. Rem. residue, remnant, remains, leavings, relic.

Remainder (rē-mān'dér), a. Remainder, refuse; left; as, the remainder vianda. 'A dry as the remainder biscuit after a voyage.' Shak.

Remainder-man (rē-mān'dér-man), n. In law, he who has an estate after a particular estate is determined.

Remake (rē-māk'), v.t. pret. & pp. remade; ppr. remaking. To make anew.

As a stream that spouting from a cliff
Falls in mid air, but gathering at the base
Remakes itself and flashes down the vale. Tennyson.

Remand (rē-mān'd'), v.t. [Fr. remander, from L. re, and mandō, to commit, to one's charge.] 1. To send, call, or order back; as, to remand an officer from a distant place.

'Remand it to its former place.' SoutH.

When a prisoner first leaves his cell he cannot know the light of day; he is unable to discriminate colours or recognise faces. But the remedy is, not to remand him into his dungeon, but to accustom him to the rays of the sun. Maccubey.

2. In law, to send back to jail, as an accused party, in order to give time to collect more evidence against him; to hold over till some future time, as a case in which further evidence is required.

Morgan is sent back into custody, whither also I am remanded. Small.

Remand (rē-mān'd'), n. The state of being remanded, recommended, or held over; the act of remanding.

He will probably apply for a series of remands from time to time, until the case is more complete. Dickens.

'How does your case stand now?' 'Why, sir, as a remand at present.' Dickens.

Remandment (rē-mān'd'ment), n. The act of remanding.

Remanence, Remanency (rem'a-nen-si), n. The state or quality of being remanent; continuance; permanence.

Neither St. Augustine nor Calvin denied the remanence of the will in the fallen spirit. Coleridge.

Remanent (rem'a-nent), n. [L. remanens, remanentis, ppr. of remaneo. See REMANE.] The part remaining; remnant. Bacon.

Remanent (rem'a-nent), a. Remanent, [Perhaps obsolete, except in Scotch legal and ecclesiastical phraseology; as, the remanent members of the trust; the remanent members of session.]

There is a remanent felicity in the very memory of those spiritual delights. Jer. Taylor.

Remanet (rem'a-net), n. [L., it remains.] In Eng. law, a suit standing over, or a proceeding connected with one which is delayed or deferred.

Remark (rē-mārk'), n. [Fr. remarquer—re and marque. See MARK.] 1. The act of remarking or taking notice; notice or observation.

6. To think of; to consider; to take into consideration; as, do not blame him too severely, you must remember his weakness.

When I remember thee upon my bed, and meditate upon thee in the night watches. Ps. lxxii. 6.

7. To keep in mind with gratitude, favour, confidence, affection, respect, or any other feeling or emotion. 'If thou wilt indeed look on the affliction of thine handmaid and remember me.' 1 Sam. i. 11. 'Remember the sabbath-day, to keep it holy.' Exod. xx. 8.

Let them have their wages duly paid, And something over to remember me. Shak.

—Remember, Recollect. Remember implies that a thing exists in the memory, but it does not imply that it is actually present in the thoughts at the moment, but that it recurs without effort. Recollect means that a fact, forgotten or partially lost to memory, is after some effort recalled and before us. Remembrance is the storehouse, recollection the act of culling out this article and that from the repository. He remembers everything he hears, and can recollect any statement when called on. The words, however, are often confounded, and we say we cannot remember a thing when we mean we cannot recollect it.

Remember (rê-mem'ber), v. i. To call something to remembrance; to exercise the faculty of recollecting.

I remember Of such a time: being my sworn servant, The duke retained him his. Shak.

Rememberable (rê-mem'ber-a-bl), a. Capable or worthy of being remembered. Coleridge.

Rememberably (rê-mem'ber-a-bl), adv. In a rememberable manner; so as to be remembered. Southey.

Rememberer (rê-mem'ber-ér), n. One that remembers. 'A rememberer of the least good office.' Wotton.

Remembrance (rê-mem'brans), n. [O. Fr. remembrance. See above.] 1. The act of remembering; the keeping of a thing in mind or recalling it to mind; a revival in the mind or memory; recollection; as, a bitter remembrance of injuries.

Remove (rê-môv'), v.t. To change place in any manner; to move from one place to another; to change the place of residence; as, to remove from Edinburgh to London.

Till Birnam wood remove to Dunsinane I can not taint with fear. Shak.
The verb remove, in most of its applications, is synonymous with move, but not in all. Thus we do not apply remove to a mere change of posture, without a change of place or the seat of a thing. A man removes his head when he turns it, or his finger when he bends it, but he does not remove it. Remove usually or always denotes a change of place in a body, but we never apply it to a regular continued course or motion. We never say, the wind or water or a ship removes at a certain rate by the hour; but we say, a ship was removed from one place in a harbour to another. Move is a generic term, including the sense of remove, which is more generally applied to a change from one station or permanent position, stand, or seat to another station.

Remove (rê-môv'), n. 1. The act of removing, or state of being removed; a removal; change of place.

Our pleasure, To such whose place is under us, requires Our quick remove from hence. Shak.

Reasonable, t. adv. [For reasonable, from O. Fr. reason, reason, also talk.] 1. Reasonable.—2. Loquacious. Pierre Plouman.

Renaissance (rê-nâs'sâns), n. [Fr., regeneration or new birth—re, again, and naissance, birth. See RENAISSANCE.] The revival of anything which has long been in decay or extinct: a term generally applied to the transitional movement in Europe from the middle ages to the modern world; but specially applied to the time of the revival of letters and arts in the fifteenth century, and in a narrower sense to the style of building and decoration which succeeded the Gothic, and was to a large extent a revival of the forms and ornaments of Roman and Grecian art.—Renaissance architecture, a style which originated in Italy in the first half of the fifteenth century, and afterwards spread over Europe. Its main characteristic is a return to the classical forms which had been displaced by the Byzantine and the Gothic. The Florentine Brunelleschi (died 1446) may be said to have originated the style, having previously prepared himself by a careful study of the remains of the monuments of ancient Rome; and his buildings are distinguished by the use of the three classical orders, with much of the classical severity and grandeur, though in design they are made conformable to the wants of his own age. He sometimes retains, however, elements derived from the style which he superseded; as for instance in his masterpiece, the dome of Santa Maria del Fiore, where he makes a skillful use of the pointed Gothic vault. From Florence the style was introduced into Rome, where the noble and simple works of Bramante (died 1514) are among the finest examples of it, the chief of these being the palace of the Chancery, the foundations of St. Peter's, part of the Vatican, the small church of San Pietro in Montorio. It reached its highest pitch of grandeur in the dome of St. Peter's, the work of Michael Angelo, after whom it declined. Another Renaissance school arose in Venice, where the majority of the buildings of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries are distinguished by the prominence given to external decoration. From this school sprang Palladio (1618-1580), after whom the distinctive style of architecture which he followed received the name of Palladian. The Renaissance architecture was introduced into France by Lombardy and Florentine architects about the end of the sixteenth century, and flourished there during the greater part of the following century, but especially in the first half under Louis XII. and Francis I. The early French architects of this period, while adopting the ancient classical orders and other features of the new style, still retained many of the features of the architecture of the preceding ages; later on they followed classical types more closely. As applied to ecclesiastical edifices, the Renaissance style of architecture is charged in France as elsewhere with depriving them of all their religious character. Towards the end of the sixteenth century the Renaissance style degenerated in France as it had done in Italy and in course of time gave rise to the dissipated productions of the so-called Rococo style. Into England the Renaissance style was introduced at a later period than into France, and it is there represented by the works of Inigo Jones, Sir C. Wren, and their contemporaries, St. Paul's, London, being a grand example of the latter architect. A great many of the princely residences of Germany belong to the Renaissance style, but not to its best period.

Renaissant (rê-nâs'sant), a. Of or pertaining to the renaissance. See RENAISSANCE. Renal (rê-nal), a. [L. renalis, from ren, pl. renes, the kidneys.] Pertaining to the kidneys or reins; as, the renal arteries.—Renal glands, in anat. two flat triangular bodies, which cover the upper part of the kidneys. A hollow cavity in the interior contains a brown, reddish, or yellowish fluid. They are small in the adult, but in the foetus longer than the kidney. Also called the supra-renal glands or capsules. They have no excretory duct, and their use is unknown, but from the bronzing of the skin observed in 'Addison's disease' (connected with these bodies) it has been assumed that they have to do with the deposition of pigmentary matter in the skin. Re-name (rê-nâm), v.t. To give a new name to.

Renard (ren'ard), n. [Fr., from O. G. Reinhard, Reginhard, strong in counsel, cunning—the name of a fox in a celebrated German epic poem.] A fox: a name used in fables, poetry, &c. It is also written Reynard.

Remove (rê-môv'), v.t. To change place in any manner; to move from one place to another; to change the place of residence; as, to remove from Edinburgh to London.

Till Birnam wood remove to Dunsinane I can not taint with fear. Shak.

The verb remove, in most of its applications, is synonymous with move, but not in all. Thus we do not apply remove to a mere change of posture, without a change of place or the seat of a thing. A man moves his head when he turns it, or his finger when he bends it, but he does not remove it. Remove usually or always denotes a change of place in a body, but we never apply it to a regular continued course or motion. We never say, the wind or water or a ship removes at a certain rate by the hour; but we say, a ship was removed from one place in a harbour to another. Move is a generic term, including the sense of remove, which is more generally applied to a change from one station or permanent position, stand, or seat to another station.

Remove (rê-môv'), n. 1. The act of removing, or state of being removed; a removal; change of place.

To such whose place is under us, requires Our quick remove from hence. Shak.

Renaissance (rê-nâ'ssâns), n. [Fr., regeneration or new birth—re, again, and nais-sance, birth. See RENAISANT.] The revival of anything which has long been in decay or extinct; a term generally applied to the transitional movement in Europe from the middle ages to the modern world; but specially applied to the time of the revival of letters and arts in the fifteenth century, and in a narrower sense to the style of building and decoration which succeeded the Gothic, and was to a large extent a revival of the forms and ornaments of Roman and Grecian art.—Renaissance architecture, a style which originated in Italy in the first half of the fifteenth century, and afterwards spread over Europe. Its main characteristic is a return to the classical forms which had been displaced by the Byzantine and the Gothic. The Florentine Brunelleschi (died 1446) may be said to have originated the style, having previously prepared himself by a careful study of the remains of the monuments of ancient Rome; and his buildings are distinguished by the use of the three classical orders, with much of the classical severity and grandeur, though in design they are made conformable to the wants of his own age. He sometimes retains, however, elements derived from the style which he superseded; as for instance in his masterpiece, the dome of Santa Maria del Fiore, where he makes a skilful use of the pointed Gothic vault. From Florence the style was introduced into Rome, where the noble and simple works of Bramante (died 1514) are among the finest examples of it, the chief of these being the palace of the Chancery, the foundations of St. Peter's, part of the Vatican, the small church of San Pietro in Montorio. It reached its highest pitch of grandeur in the dome of St. Peter's, the work of Michael Angelo, after whom it declined. Another Renaissance school arose in Venice, where the majority of the buildings of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries are distinguished by the prominence given to external decoration. From this school sprang Palladio (1518-1580), after whom the distinctive style of architecture which he followed received the name of 'Palladian'. The Renaissance architecture was introduced into France by Lombard and Florentine architects about the end of the sixteenth century, and flourished there during the greater part of the following century, but especially in the first half under Louis XII. and Francis I. The early French architects of this period, while adopting the ancient classical orders and other features of the new style, still retained many of the features of the architecture of the preceding ages; later on they followed classical types more closely. As applied to ecclesiastical edifices, the Renaissance style of architecture is charged in France as elsewhere with depriving them of all their religious character. Towards the end of the sixteenth century the Renaissance style degenerated in France as it had done in Italy and in course of time gave rise to the dissipated productions of the so-called Rococo style. Into England the Renaissance style was introduced at a later period than into France, and it is there represented by the works of Inigo Jones, Sir C. Wren, and their contemporaries, St. Paul's, London, being a grand example of the latter architect. A great many of the princely residences of Germany belong to the Renaissance style, but not to its best period.

Renaissant (rê-nâ'ssant), a. Of or pertaining to the renaissance. See RENAISSANCE.

Renal (rê-nal), a. [L. renalis, from ren, pi renes, the kidneys.] Pertaining to the kidneys or reins; as, the renal arteries.—Renal glands, in anat. two flat triangular bodies, which cover the upper part of the kidneys. A hollow cavity in the interior contains a brown, reddish, or yellowish fluid. They are small in the adult, but in the foetus longer than the kidney. Also called the supra-renal glands or capsules. They have no excretory duct, and their use is unknown, but from the bronzing of the skin observed in 'Addison's disease' (connected with these bodies) it has been assumed that they have to do with the deposition of pigmentary matter in the skin.

Re-name (rê-nâm'), v.t. To give a new name to.

Renard (ren'ard), n. [Fr., from O. G. Reinhart, Reinhart, strong in counsel, cunning—the name of a fox in a celebrated German epic poem.] A fox; a name used in fables, poetry, &c. It is also written Reynard.

Among these, Fancy next
Her office holds; of all exterior things
Which the five watchful senses represent
She forms imaginations, airy shapes. Milton.

9. To present again; to bring again before the mind; to re-present. Sir W. Hamilton. Re-present (ré-pré-zent'), v.t. [Prefix re, and present.] To present anew; to present to the mind after having been observed before.

Good reasoning is the ideal assemblage of facts, and their re-presentation to the mind in the order of their actual series. It is seeing with the mind's eye. Bad reasoning will always be found to depend on some of the objects not being mentally present; some links in the chain are dropped or overlooked; some objects instead of being represented are left absent, or are presented so imperfectly that the inferences from them are as erroneous as the inferences from imperfect vision are erroneous. Bad reasoning is imperfect re-presentation. G. H. Lewis.

Representable (rep-ré-zent'-a-bl), a. Capable of being represented. Coleridge.

The peripherally-initiated feelings of external origin are more representable than those of internal origin; and both of these can be represented with greater facility than the centrally-initiated feelings. H. Spencer.

Representance (rep-ré-zent'-ans), n. Representation; likeness. Donne.

Representant (rep-ré-zent'-ant), a. Representing; having vicarious power.

Representant (rep-ré-zent'-ant), n. A representative.

There is expected the Count Henry of Nassau to be at the said solemnity, as the representant of his brother. Wotton.

Representation (rep'ré-zen-tā'shon), n. 1. The act of representing, describing, exhibiting, portraying, &c. — 2. That which represents; the means by which something is represented: more particularly, (a) an image or likeness; a picture or statue; as, representations of natural scenery. (b) Exhibition of a play on the stage, or of a character in a play; a dramatic performance. (c) Verbal description; statement of arguments or facts, &c.; as, the representation of an historian, of a witness, or an advocate. Hence sometimes, specifically, a written expostulation; a remonstrance.

He threatened 'to send his Jack-boot to rule the country,' when the senate once ventured to make a representation against his ruinous policy. Brougham.

3. The part performed by a representative or deputy; especially, the function of the delegate of a constituency in a legislative assembly; the system according to which communities are represented in such assemblies; as, the representation of a county or borough in parliament.

The reform in representation he uniformly opposed. Burke.

4. A number of delegates or representatives collectively. — 5. In law, (a) the standing in the place of another, as an heir, or in the right of taking by inheritance; the personating of another, as heirs, executors, administrators. In Scots law, the term is usually applied to the obligation incurred by an heir to pay the debts and perform the obligations incumbent upon his predecessor. (b) A collateral statement in insurance, either by parol or in writing, of such facts or circumstances relating to the proposed adventure, and not inserted in the policy, as are necessary for the information of the insurer, to enable him to form a just estimate of the risk. (c) In Scots law, the written pleading presented to a lord-ordinary of the Court of Session when his judgment was brought under review. — SVX Description, show, delineation, portraiture, likeness, resemblance, exhibition, sight.

Re-presentation (ré-pré-zen-tā'shon), n. The act of presenting to the mind what was formerly present, but is now absent.

If all reasoning be the re-presentation of what is now absent but formerly was present, and can again be made present,—in other words, if the test of accurate reasoning is its reduction to fact,—then is it evident that Philosophy, dealing with transcendental objects which cannot be present, and employing a method which admits of no verification (or reduction to the test of fact), must be an impossible attempt. G. H. Lewis.

Representational (rep'ré-zen-tā'shon-al), a. Pertaining to, or containing representation.

Representational (rep'ré-zen-tā'shon-a-ri), a. Of or pertaining to representation; representative; as, a representational system of government. [Rare.]

Representative (rep-ré-zent'-a-tiv), a. [Fr. représentatif. See REPRESENT.] 1. Fitted to represent, portray, or typify; exhibiting likeness or similitude.

They relieve themselves with this distinction, and yet own the legal sacrifices, though representative, to be proper and real. Atterbury.

2. Bearing the character or power of another; acting as a substitute for others; performing the functions of others; as, a representative body.

This council of four hundred was chosen, one hundred out of each tribe, and seems to have been a body representative of the people. Swift.

3. Conducted by the agency of delegates who are chosen by the people; as, a representative government.

He (Cromwell) gave the country a constitution far more perfect than any which had at that time been known in the world. He reformed the representative system in a manner which has extorted praise even from Lord Clarendon. Macaulay.

4. In nat. hist. presenting the full characteristics of the type of a group; as, a representative genus. — 5. In metaph. (a) giving a transcript of what is directly presented to or known by the mind; as, the representative faculties. (b) Existing as a transcript of what was originally directly presented to or known by the mind; as, representative knowledge.

Representative (rep-ré-zent'-a-tiv), n. 1. One who or that which represents or exhibits the likeness of another; that by which anything is represented or exhibited. 'A statue of Rumour, whispering an idiot in the ear, who was the representative of credulity.' Addison.

This doctrine supposes the perfections of God to be representatives to us of whatever we perceive in the creatures. Locke.

2. An agent, deputy, or substitute, who supplies the place of another or others, being invested with his or their authority; as, an attorney is the representative of his client or employer; a member of the House of Commons is the representative of his constituents and of the nation. — 3. In law, one that stands in the place of another as heir, or in the right of succeeding to an estate of inheritance, or to a crown. — Real representative, an heir-at-law or devisee. — Personal representative, an executor or administrator. — House of Representatives, the lower or popular branch of the supreme legislative body in the United States; the lower house of the national congress. It consists of members chosen biennially by the people of the several states in numbers proportioned to their population. Each state appoints at least one representative.

Representatively (rep-ré-zent'-a-tiv-ly), adv. In a representative manner. Barrow.

The seizure or taking of anything from an enemy by way of retaliation or indemnification for something taken or detained by him; also, that which is so taken.

Reprisals are used between nation and nation in order to do themselves justice when they cannot otherwise obtain it. If a nation has taken possession of what belongs to another—if she refuses to pay a debt, to repair an injury, or to give adequate satisfaction for it, the latter seizes something belonging to the former, and applies it to her own advantage, unless she obtains payment of what is due to her, together with interest and damages, or may keep it as a pledge until she has received ample satisfaction. . . . Reprisals are either a diary, as arresting and taking the goods of men and strangers within the realm, or a retaliatory, as satisfaction out of the realm, and are under the great seal. Warton.

2. The act of retorting on an enemy by inflicting suffering or death on a prisoner taken from him, in retaliation of an act of inhumanity. — 3. Any taking by way of retaliation; an act of severity done in retaliation.

This gentleman, as it seems, being very desirous to make reprisals upon me, undertakes to furnish out a whole section of gross misrepresentations made by me in my quotations. Warton.

In theol. the act of consigning, or the state of being consigned to eternal punishment; or, that decree by which a certain number of the human race are supposed to have been set apart from eternity as reprobates: the opposite of election. — 4. In eccl. law, the pronouncing of exceptions either to facts, persons, or things.

Reprobationer (rep'rô-bâ'shon-ér), n. In theol. one who believes in the doctrine of the reprobation of the non-elect.

Let them take heed that they mistake not their own fierce temper for the mind of God. . . . But I never knew any of the Geneva or Scotch model, which sort of sanctified reprobationers we should with, either use or like this way of preaching in my life; but generally whips and scorpions, wrath and vengeance, fire and brimstone, made both top and bottom, front and rear, first and last, of all their discourses. South.

Reprobative, Reprobatory (rep'rô-bât-iv, rep'rô-bât-ô-ri), a. Of or pertaining to reprobation; condemning in strong terms; criminatory.

Reprobator (rep'rô-bât-ôr), n. In Scots law, formerly an action instituted for the purpose of convicting a witness of perjury, or of proving that he was liable to the objections of agency, enmity, partial counsel, or the like.

Reproduce (rê-prô-dûs'), v.t. pret. & pp. reproduced; ppr. reproducing. 1. To produce or yield again or anew; to renew the production of; to generate, as offspring; as, trees are reproduced by new shoots from the roots or stump; and certain animals, as the polyps, are reproduced by gemmation or budding.

If horse-dung reproduces oats it will not be easily determined where the power of generation ceaseth. Sir. T. Arden.

2. To make a copy of; to portray; to represent; to bring to the memory or imagination; as, he reproduced the scene on canvas.

Reproducer (rê-prô-dûs-er), n. One who or that which reproduces. 'The reproducer of this fatal scheme.' Burke.

Reproduction (rê-prô-dûk'shon), a. 1. The act or process of reproducing, presenting, or yielding again.

The labourers and labouring cattle, therefore, employed in agriculture, not only occasion, like the workmen in manufactures, the reproduction of a value equal to their own consumption, or to the capital which employs them, together with its owners' profits, but of a much greater value. Adam Smith.

Specifically—2. The process whereby new individuals are generated and the perpetuation of the species insured; the process whereby new organisms are produced from those already existing; as, the reproduction of plants or animals.

And all the admirable contrivances of nature, for the reproduction of the species of all the myriads of organized nature, where shall we behold any for that of the same individual? Falmer.

3. That which is reproduced or revived; that which is presented anew; as, the play is not new, it is a reproduction.

Reproductive, Reproductive (rê-prô-dûk'tiv, rê-prô-dûk'tô-ri), a. Pertaining to or employed in reproduction; tending to reproduce; as, the reproductive organs of an animal.

Repromulgate (rê-prô-mul-gât'), v.t. To promulgate again; to republish.

Repromulgation (rê-prô-mul-gât'shon), a. A second or repeated promulgation.

Reproof (rê-prôf'), n. [From reprove (which see).] 1. The expression of blame or censure addressed to a person; blame expressed to the face; censure for a fault; reprehension; rebuke; reprimand.

If you think well to carry this as you may, the doubtfulness of the benefit defends the deceit from reproof. Shak.

Those best can bear reproof, who merit praise. Pope.

2. Disproof; confutation; refutation.

The virtue of this jest will be the incomprehensible lies that this same fat rogue will tell us when we meet at supper . . . what words, what blows, what extremities he endured; and in the reproof of this lies the jest. Shak.

—Admonition, Reprehension, Reproof. See under ADMONITION. —SYN. Reprehension, chiding, reprimand, rebuke, censure, blame.

Reprovable (rê-prôv'â-bl), a. Worthy of being reprov'd; deserving reproof or censure; blamable. Jer. Taylor. —SYN. Blamable, censurable, reprehensible, culpable, rebukable.

Reprune (rê-prôv'), v.t. 1. To prune or trim again, as trees or shrubs. Boslyn. —2. To dress or trim again, as a bird its feathers. 'Yet soon reprunes her wing to soar anew.' Young.

Rep-silver (rep-sil-vér), n. Money anciently paid by servile tenants to their lord, to be quit of the duty of reaping his corn.

Reptant (rep'tant), a. [See REPTATION.] In bot. and zool. creeping; crawling; reptatory.

Reptation (rep-tâ'shon), n. [L. reptatio, reptationis, from repto, freq. of repto, to creep.] The act of creeping or crawling, as of the serpents and other members of the Reptilia.

Reptatory (rep'ta-tô-ri), a. In zool. creeping; crawling; reptant; as, reptatory animals.

Reptile (rep'til), a. [Fr. reptile, creeping, from L. reptilis, creeping, from reptum, supine of repto, to creep. Curtius considers repto = serpo, a metathesis of serpo, to creep. Cog. Gr. herpo, to creep. Sk. srip, to go.] 1. Creeping; moving on the belly, or with small, short legs. —2. Grovelling; low; mean; vulgar; as, a reptile race or crew. 'A false, reptile prudence.' Burke.

Dislodge their reptile souls
From the bodies and forms of men. Coleridge.

Reptile (rep'til), n. 1. In a general sense, an animal that moves on its belly, or by means of small short legs, as snakes, lizards, caterpillars, &c.; a crawling creature; specifically, in zool. an animal belonging to the class Reptilia (which see).

An inadvertent step may crush the snail,
That crawls at evening in the public path;
But he that has humanity, forewarn'd
Will step aside and let the reptile live. Cowper.

2. A grovelling, abject, or mean person: a term of contempt.

It would be the highest folly and arrogance in the reptile Man to imagine that he, by any of his endeavours, could add to the glory of God. Warburton.

Reptilia (rep-ti'li-a), n. pl. A class of vertebrate animals, constituting with the birds, to which they are most closely allied, Huxley's second division of vertebrates, Sauropsida. The reptiles lie between amphibia and birds, differing from the former chiefly in breathing by lungs during the whole period of their existence; and from birds in being cold-blooded, in the body being supplied with a mixture of venous and arterial blood, in being covered by plates or scales instead of feathers, and in the fore-legs never being constructed—in living reptiles at least—on the type of wings. The heart has only three cavities, viz. two separate auricles and a single ventricular cavity, usually divided into two by an incomplete partition. In the Crocodilia alone is the partition between the ventricles a perfect one; and even in these the heart consists functionally of no more than three chambers. The lungs are less cellular than in birds and mammals, and often attain a great size. Reptiles are oviparous, but in some cases, as in vipers and some lizards, the eggs are retained in the body till the young are ready to be excluded, when the animal is said to be ovo-viviparous. The lower jaw articulates with the skull by a quadrate bone, and, as this often projects backward, the opening of the mouth is very great and may even extend beyond the base of the skull. Except in the turtles and tortoises, teeth adapted rather for seizing and holding prey than for masticating it are present, but, save in the crocodiles, are not sunk in sockets. Ribs are always present. With the exception of the tortoises, reptiles are of an elongated form. In the serpents and some lizards no traces of limbs appear; in other lizards they are rudimentary, whilst in the remainder of the class they are fully developed, but not to the extent to which development takes place in birds and quadrupeds, these members seldom being of sufficient length to keep the belly from the ground. All reptiles have horny epidermic scales, and the class is divided into two sections—Squamata and Loricata, according as the exo-skeleton consists simply of these scales, or there are osseous plates developed in the derma as well. The class is divided into ten orders, of which the first four are represented by living forms; the remaining six are extinct. The living orders are the Chelonla (tortoises and turtles), Ophidia (serpents and snakes), Lacertilia (lizards), Crocodilia (crocodiles and alligators). The extinct orders are the Ichthyopterygia, Sauropterygia, Anomodontia, Pterosauria, Deinosaurs, and Theriodontia.

Reptilian (rep-ti'li-an), a. Belonging to the Reptilia or reptiles. —Reptilian age, in geol. the era in which the class of reptiles attained its highest expansion, comprising the triassic, jurassic, and cretaceous periods.

Reptilian (rep-ti'li-an), n. An animal of the class Reptilia; a reptile.

Republic (ré-pub'lik), n. [Fr. république, L. respublica—res, an affair, interest, and publica, fem. of publicus, public.] 1. A commonwealth; a political constitution in which the supreme power in the state is vested not in a hereditary ruler, but either in certain privileged members of the community or in the whole community. According to the constitution of the governing body a republic may therefore vary from the most exclusive oligarchy to a pure democracy, the supreme power in the former being assigned to the nobles or a few privileged individuals, as was formerly the case in Venice and Genoa; while in the latter the supreme power is placed in the hands of rulers chosen periodically by and from the whole body of the people, or by their representatives assembled in a congress or national assembly. The purest and most ancient form of a republic was that in which all the citizens met in common assembly to enact their laws, a system practicable only in very small states, and which accordingly has been superseded in all modern republics of the world by the representative system. The United States of America and Switzerland are federal republics, consisting of a number of separate states bound together by treaty, so as to present to the external world the aspect of a single state with a central government, without wholly renouncing their individual powers of internal self-government. —2. One's country at large; the state; the public.

Those that by their deeds will make it known,
Whose dignity they do sustain;
And life, state, glory, all they gain,
Count the republic's, not their own. B. Jonson.

—Republic of letters, the collective body of literary and learned men.

Republican (ré-pub'li-kan), a. 1. Pertaining to a republic; consisting of a commonwealth; as, a republican constitution or government. —2. Consonant to the principles of a republic; as, republican sentiments or opinions; republican manners. —Republican party, in United States politics, a name first applied to the party which favoured a strong central government, not acting through the states, but directly upon the people: opposed to the Democratic party, which maintained the rights of individual states. The party was latterly identified with the anti-slavery movement, and may be, in a general way, described as analogous to the British Liberal party.

Republican (ré-pub'li-kan), n. 1. One who favours or prefers a republican form of government.

There is a want of polish in the subjects of free states which has made the roughness of a republican almost proverbial. Brougham.

2. In United States politics, one of the Republican party. See under the adjective. —Black Republicans, a name applied by their opponents to the Republican party in the United States, from their anti-slavery tendencies. —Red Republican. See under RED. Republicanism (ré-pub'li-kan-izm), n. 1. A republican form or system of government. —2. Attachment to a republican form of government; republican principles; as, his republicanism was of the most advanced type.

His (the sailor's) sleeps are but reprisals of his dangers.
Sir T. Overbury.

Reprove (rê-prôv'), v. [O.E. reprove, repreve, reproof, censure; but in this case apparently re-prove, a fresh proof or trial—re, again, and old prove, proof, a proof, test, trial; or, according to another view, from O.Fr. reprover, reprover, to blame, condemn; L. reprobare (re, and probo, to prove), to reject, condemn, meaning originally the rejection of a sentence already passed. Retrieve is a word that has undergone a similar change of form.] 1. The suspension of the execution of a criminal's sentence. It may take place (a) at the mere pleasure of the crown; (b) where the judge is not satisfied with the verdict, or the indictment is insufficient, or any favourable circumstances appear in the criminal's character, in order to give time to apply to the crown for either an absolute or conditional pardon; (c) where a woman is capitally convicted and pleads her pregnancy; (d) where the criminal becomes insane. The word is popularly but incorrectly used to signify a permanent remission, or commutation of a capital sentence.

The morning Sir John Hotham was to die, a reprove was sent to suspend the execution for three days.
Lord Clarendon.

2. Bespite; interval of ease or relief.

All that I ask is but a short reprove.
Till I forget to love, and learn to grieve. Denham.

South.

Reprint (ré-prînt'), n. A second or a new impression or edition of any printed work; reimpression.

Reprisal (ré-prîz'al), n. [Fr. reprisaille, from It. ripreavaglia, from L.L. reprisalia, from L. reprehendo, to take again; comp. prize, a capture, reprise, a taking back, also from L. prehendo.] 1. The seizure or taking of anything from an enemy by way of retaliation or indemnification for something taken or detained by him; also, that which is so taken.

Reprisals are used between nation and nation in order to do themselves justice when they cannot otherwise obtain it. If a nation has taken possession of what belongs to another—if she refuses to pay a debt, to repair an injury, or to give adequate satisfaction for it, the latter seizes something belonging to the former, and applies it to her own advantage, unless she obtains payment of what is due to her, together with interest and damages, or may keep it as a pledge until she has received ample satisfaction. . . . Reprisals are either ordinary, as arresting and taking the goods of merchant-strangers within the realm, or extraordinary, as satisfaction out of the realm, and are under the great seal. H'arton.

2. The act of retorting on an enemy by inflicting suffering or death on a prisoner taken from him, in retaliation of an act of inhumanity. — 3. Any taking by way of retaliation; an act of severity done in retaliation.

This gentleman, as it seems, being very desirous to make reprisals upon me, undertakes to furnish out a whole section of gross misrepresentations made by me in my quotations.
Waterland.

4. Same as Recaption.—Letters of marque and reprisal. See MARQUE.

Reprise (ré-prîz'), n. [Fr. reprise, from reprendre, to take back; L. reprehendo. See REPRISAL.] 1. A taking by way of retaliation.

If so, a just reprise would only be Of what the land usurp'd upon the sea. Dryden.

2. A term used by masons to denote the return of mouldings in an internal angle. —

3. In maritime law, a ship recaptured from an enemy or pirate. If recaptured within twenty-four hours of her capture, she must be restored to her owners in whole, if after that period she is the lawful prize of those who recaptured her.—4. pl. In law, yearly deductions, duties, or payments out of a manor and lands as rent-charge, rent-sock, annuities, and the like. Written also Reprizes.

Reprise (ré-prîz'), v. 1. To take again; to retake. Spenser; Chapman.—2. To recompense; to pay.

Repristinate (ré-prîs'ti-nât'), v. To restore to pristine or first state or condition. [Rare.]

Repristination (ré-prîs'ti-nâ'shon'), n. The act of restoring to original or first state or condition, or the state of being so restored; resuscitation. [Rare.]

Reprise (ré-prîv'), v. To reprove; to rescue; to relieve from. Spenser.

Reprise (ré-prîz'), v. To prize anew.

Reprise (ré-prîz'), n. See REPRISAL, 4.

Reproach (ré-prôch'), v. [Fr. reprocher, O.Fr. reprocher, Pr. reprochar, to reproach, which Diez refers to a L.L. repropiare, from L. re, back, and prope, near. Reproach thus signifies primarily to bring near, to bring, as it were, under one's eyes. Compare sense of object (verb), which also primarily signifies to bring before the face. So also approach, from L. prope.] 1. To charge with a fault in severe language; to censure with severity, opprobrium, or contempt; to upbraid; now usually with a personal object. Mozentius, . . . with his ardent war'd His fainting friends, reproach'd their shameful flight. Dryden.

That this new-come Shame There sit not, and reproach us as unclean. Milton.

Am I the cause, I the poor cause that men Reproach you, saying all your force is gone? Tennyson.

2. To disgrace. 'Else imputation . . . might reproach your life.' Shak.—Reprove, Rebuke, Reprimand, Censure, Remonstrate, Expostulate, Reproach. See under CENSURE.—SYN. To upbraid, censure, blame, rebuke, condemn, revile, vilify.

Reproach (ré-prôch'), n. 1. The act of reproaching; a severe or cutting expression of censure or blame; censure mingled with contempt or opprobrium; contumelious or opprobrious language towards any person; abusive reflections; as, to heap reproaches on a person. 'Foul-mouthed reproach.' Shak.
2. An occasion of blame or censure; shame; infamy; disgrace.

Give not thine heritage to reproach. Joel ii. 17.

3. Object of contempt, scorn, or derision. Come, and let us build up the wall of Jerusalem, that we may be no more a reproach. Neh. ii. 17.

Reprove (rê-prûv), v.t. pret. & pp. reproofed; ppr. reproofing. [Fr. reprover, to blame, to censure; O. Fr. reprover, from L. reprobo. See REPROBATE.] 1. To charge with a fault to the face; to chide; to reprehend. Luke iii. 19. Formerly sometimes with of; as, to reprove one of laziness. Carver.—2. To express disapproval of; as, to reprove sins; with a thing as object.—3. To have the effect of censuring; to serve to admonish.

The vicious cannot bear the presence of the good, whose very looks reprove them, and whose life is a severe, though silent admonition. Buckminster.

4. To convince, as of a fault; to make manifest.

When he is come he will reprove the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment. John xvi. 8.

5. To refute; to disprove.

My lords,
Reprove my allegation if you can,
Or else conclude my words effectual. Shak.

—Reprove, Rebuke, Reprimand, Censure, Remonstrate, Expostulate, Reproach. See under CENSURE.—SYN. To reprehend, chide, rebuke, scold, blame, censure.

Reprover (rê-prûv-er), n. One that reproves; one who or that which blames. 'The reprovers of vice.' Locke.

Reprovingly (rê-prûv-ing-ly), adv. In a reproving manner.

Reprune (rê-prûn), v.t. 1. To prune or trim again, as trees or shrubs. Bvelyn.—2. To dress or trim again, as a bird its feathers. 'Yet soon reprunes her wing to soar anew.' Young.

Reptant (rep-tant), a. [See REPTATOR.] In bot. and zool. creeping; crawling; reptatory.

Reptation (rep-tâ-shon), n. [L. reptatio, reptationis, from repto, freq. of repto, to creep.] The act of creeping or crawling, as of the serpents and other members of the Reptilia.

Reptatory (rep-tâ-to-ri), a. In zool. creeping; crawling; reptant; as, reptatory animals.

Reptile (rep-til), a. [Fr. reptile, creeping, from L. reptilis, creeping, from repto, supine of repto, to creep. Curtius considers repto = serpo, a metathesis of serpo, to creep. Cog. Gr. kerpô, to creep, Sk. srip, to go.] 1. Creeping; moving on the belly, or with small, short legs.—2. Grovelling; low; mean; vulgar; as, a reptile race or crew. 'A false, reptile prudence.' Burke.

Dislodge their reptile souls
From the bodies and forms of men. Coleridge.

Reptile (rep-til), n. 1. In a general sense, an animal that moves on its belly, or by means of small short legs, as snakes, lizards, caterpillars, &c.; a crawling creature; specifically, in zool. an animal belonging to the class Reptilia (which see).

An inadvertent step may crush the snail,
That crawls at evening in the public path;
But he that has humanity, forewarn'd
Will step aside and let the reptile live. Comper.

2. A grovelling, abject, or mean person: a term of contempt.

It would be the highest folly and arrogance in the reptile Man to imagine that he, by any of his endeavours, could add to the glory of God. Warburton.

Reptilia (rep-tî-li-a), n. pl. A class of vertebrate animals, constituting with the birds, to which they are most closely allied, Huxley's second division of vertebrates, Sauropsida. The reptiles lie between amphibia and birds, differing from the former chiefly in breathing by lungs during the whole period of their existence; and from birds in being cold-blooded, in the body being supplied with a mixture of venous and arterial blood, in being covered by plates or scales instead of feathers, and in the fore-legs never being constructed—in living reptiles at least—on the type of wings. The heart has only three cavities, viz. two separate auricles and a single ventricular cavity, usually divided into two by an incomplete partition. In the Crocodilia alone is the partition between the ventricles a perfect one; and even in these the heart consists functionally of no more than three chambers. The lungs are less cellular than in birds and mammals, and often attain a great size. Reptiles are oviparous, but in some cases, as in vipers and some lizards, the eggs are retained in the body till the young are ready to be excluded, when the animal is said to be ovo-viviparous. The lower jaw articulates with the skull by a quadrate bone, and, as this often projects backward, the opening of the mouth is very great and may even extend beyond the base of the skull. Except in the turtles and tortoises, teeth adapted rather for seizing and holding prey than for masticating it are present, but save in the crocodiles, are not sunk in sockets. Ribs are always present. With the exception of the tortoises, reptiles are of an elongated form. In the serpents and some lizards no traces of limbs appear; in other lizards they are rudimentary, while in the remainder of the class they are fully developed, but not to the extent to which development takes place in birds and quadrupeds, these members seldom being of sufficient length to keep the belly from the ground. All reptiles have horny epidermic scales, and the class is divided into two sections—Squamata and Loricata, according as the exo-skeleton consists simply of these scales, or there are osseous plates developed in the derma as well. The class is divided into ten orders, of which the first four are represented by living forms; the remaining six are extinct. The living orders are the Chelonina (tortoises and turtles), Ophidia (serpents and snakes), Lacertilia (lizards), Crocodilia (crocodiles and alligators). The extinct orders are the Ichthyopterygia, Sauropterygia, Anomodontia, Plesiosauria, Deinosauria, and Theriodontia.

Reptilian (rep-tî-li-an), a. Belonging to the Reptilia or reptiles.—Reptilian age, in geol. the era in which the class of reptiles attained its highest expansion, comprising the triassic, jurassic, and cretaceous periods.

Reptilian (rep-tî-li-an), n. An animal of the class Reptilia; a reptile.

Republic (rê-pub'lik), n. [Fr. république, L. respublica—res, an affair, interest, and publica, fem. of publicus, public.] 1. A commonwealth; a political constitution in which the supreme power in the state is vested not in a hereditary ruler, but either in certain privileged members of the community or in the whole community. According to the constitution of the governing body a republic may therefore vary from the most exclusive oligarchy to a pure democracy, the supreme power in the former being consigned to the nobles or a few privileged individuals, as was formerly the case in Venice and Genoa; while in the latter the supreme power is placed in the hands of rulers chosen periodically by and from the whole body of the people, or by their representatives assembled in a congress or national assembly. The purest and most ancient form of a republic was that in which all the citizens met in common assembly to enact their laws, a system practicable only in very small states, and which accordingly has been superseded in all modern republics of the world by the representative system. The United States of America and Switzerland are federal republics, consisting of a number of separate states bound together by treaty, so as to present to the external world the aspect of a single state with a central government, without wholly renouncing their individual powers of internal self-government.—2. One's country at large; the state; the public.

Those that by their deeds will make it known,
Whose dignity they do sustain;
And life, state, glory, all they gain,
Count the republic's, not their own. B. Jonson.

—Republic of letters, the collective body of literary and learned men.

Republican (rê-pub'li-kan), a. 1. Pertaining to a republic; consisting of a commonwealth; as, a republican constitution or government.—2. Consonant to the principles of a republic; as, republican sentiments or opinions; republican manners.—Republican party, in United States politics, a name first applied to the party which favoured a strong central government, not acting through the states, but directly upon the people; opposed to the Democratic party, which maintained the rights of individual states. The party was latterly identified with the anti-slavery movement, and may be, in a general way, described as analogous to the British Liberal party.

Republican (rê-pub'li-kan), n. 1. One who favours or prefers a republican form of government.

There is a want of polish in the subjects of free states which has made the roughness of a republican almost proverbial. Brougham.

2. In United States politics, one of the Republican party. See under the adjective.—Black Republicans, a name applied by their opponents to the Republican party in the United States, from their anti-slavery tendencies.—Red Republican. See under RED.

Republicanism (rê-pub'li-kan-izm), n. 1. A republican form or system of government.—2. Attachment to a republican form of government; republican principles; as, his republicanism was of the most advanced type.

Republicanism (rê-pub'li-kan-iz), v.t. To convert to republican principles; as, to republicanism the rising generation.

Republication (rê-pub'li-kan-iz'shon), n. 1. The act of republishing; a new publication of something before published; as, the republication of a book or pamphlet. — 2. The reprint in one country of a work published in another. — 3. In law, a second publication of a former will after cancelling or revoking.

If there be many testaments, the last overthrows all the former; but the republishing of a former will revokes one of a later date, and establishes the first. Blackstone.

Republish (ré-pub'lish), v.t. To publish anew; (a) to publish again, as a new edition of a book. (b) To print or publish again, as a foreign reprint. (c) In law, to revive, as a will revoked, either by re-execution or by a codicil. Blackstone.

Republisher (ré-pub'lish-ér), n. One who republishes.

Repudiable (ré-pú'di-á-bl), a. Capable of being repudiated or rejected; fit or proper to be put away.

Repudiate (ré-pú'di-át), v.t. pret. & pp. repudiated; ppr. repudiating. [L. repudio, repudiatus, to divorce, to cast off or reject, from repudiare, a casting off, a divorce.] 1. To cast away; to reject; to discard; to renounce; to disavow.

Atheists . . . repudiate all title to the kingdom of heaven. Bentley.

2. To put away; to divorce.

His separation from Terentia, whom he repudiated not long afterward, was perhaps an affliction to him at this time. Bolingbroke.

3. To refuse to acknowledge or to pay, as debt; to disclaim; specifically, to disown, as debts contracted by a former government for the convenience or to meet the necessities of the state.

Repudiation (ré-pú'di-á'shon), n. [L. repudiatio, repudiatus, from repudio. See REPUDIATE.] The act of repudiating or the state of being repudiated: (a) rejection; disavowal or renunciation of a right or obligation. (b) The putting away of a wife or a woman betrothed; divorce. (c) Refusal on the part of a government to pay debts contracted by a former government. (d) Eccles. the refusal to accept a benefice.

Repudiationist (ré-pú'di-á'shon-ist), n. One who advocates repudiation; one who disclaims liability for debt contracted by a predecessor in office, &c.

Repudiator (ré-pú'di-át-ér), n. One who repudiates.

Repugn (ré-pún'), v.t. [L. repugno, to fight against — re, against, and pugno, to fight.] To oppose; to resist; to fight against. 'When stubbornly he did repugn the truth.' Shak.

Repugn (ré-pún'), v.t. To oppose; to make resistance. Spenser.

Nature repugning, they scarce taste anything that may be profitable. Sir T. Elyot.

Repugnable (ré-pún'-á-bl), a. Capable of being resisted.

Repugnance (ré-pug'nans), n. [Fr. répugnance, L. repugnantis, from repugno, to resist — re, against, and pugno, to fight (whence pugnacious, impugn, &c.)] 1. The state of being opposed in mind; opposition of mind; reluctance; unwillingness. 'The repugnances which we naturally have to labour.' Dryden.

It was the part of a prudent successor to preserve an undeviating economy, to remove without repugnance or delay the irritations of monopolies and purveyance, and to remedy those alleged abuses in the church. Hallam.

2. Opposition of principles or qualities; inconsistency; contrariety; as, the repugnance of a thing to reason. 'Repugnances of works and words.' Prynne. — Antipathy, Hatred, Aversion, Repugnance. See under ANTI-PATHY. — SYN. Reluctance, unwillingness, aversion, dislike, antipathy, hatred, hostility, irreconcilableness, contrariety, inconsistency.

Repugnancy (ré-pug'nans), n. 1. Repugnance; contrariety; inconsistency.

But where difference is without repugnancy, that which hath been can be no prejudice to that which is. Hooker.

2. Act of resisting; resistance.

And let the foes quietly cut their throats, Without repugnancy. Shak.

Repugnant (ré-pug'nant), a. [L. repugnans, repugnantis, ppr. of repugno. See REPUGNANCE.] 1. Standing or being in opposition; opposite; contrary; at variance; inconsistent; usually followed by to, but sometimes by with; as, a supposition repugnant to common sense; every sin is repugnant to the will of God. 'So repugnant and contrarie are the physicians one to another.' Holland. 'A sens repugnant with their other known doctrines.' Waterland. 'Maxims repugnant to justice.' Principal Robertson.

There is no breach of a divine law, but is more or less repugnant unto the will of the lawgiver. God himself. Parkins.

2. Highly distasteful; offensive; as, that course was most repugnant to me. — 3. † Disobedient; refractory; not obsequious.

His antique sword
Rebellious to his arm, lies where it falls Repugnant to command. Shak.

4. In law, contrary to what is stated before; inconsistent; generally used of a clause in an instrument inconsistent with some other clause or with the general object of the instrument. — SYN. Opposite, opposed, adverse, contrary, inconsistent, irreconcilable, hostile, inimical.

Repugnantly (ré-pug'nant-ly), adv. In a repugnant manner; with opposition; in contradiction. Sir T. Browne.

Repugnate (ré-pug'nát), v.t. To oppose; to fight against.

Repullulate (ré-pul'lú-lát), v.t. [L. re, again, and pulullus, to bud, from pulullus, dim. of pullus, a young animal, a chicken.] To bud again. Hovell.

Repullulation (ré-pul'lú-lá'shon), n. The act of budding again.

Repulse (ré-puls'), n. [L. repulsus, from repello, repulsus — re, back, and pello, to drive.]

1. The condition of being repelled; the condition of being checked in advancing, or driven back by force. 'By fate repelled, and with repulses tired.' Sir J. Denham. — 2. The act of repelling or driving back.

He received in the repulse of Tarquin, seven hurts to the body. Shak.

3. Refusal; denial.

Take no repulse, whatever she doth say. Shak.

4. Failure; disappointment.

Do not, for one repulse, forego the purpose
That you resolved to effect. Shak.

Repulse (ré-puls'), v.t. pret. & pp. repulsed; ppr. repulsing. [See the noun.] 1. To repel; to beat or drive back; as, to repulse an assailant or advancing enemy.

Complete to have discovered and repulsed
Whatever wiles of foe or seeming friend. Milton.

2. To refuse; to reject.

She took the fruits of my advice;
And he, repulsed — a short tale to make —
Fell into a sadness. Shak.

Repulseless (ré-puls'les), a. Incapable of being repelled. [Rare.]

Repulser (ré-puls'ér), n. One who or that which repulses or drives back.

Repulsion (ré-pul'shon), n. [L. repulsio, repulsio, from repello, repulsus. See REPEL.] The act of repelling or driving back, or the state of being repelled; specifically, in physics, a term often applied to the action which two bodies exert upon one another when they tend to increase their mutual distance. It was formerly thought that there were two forces, attraction and repulsion, which balanced and counteracted each other; but it is now known that all apparent repulsion is merely a difference of attractions. All repulsion can be referred to attraction, and attraction to displacements in and through material media.

Repulsive (ré-pul'siv), a. 1. Acting so as to repel or drive away; exercising repulsion; repelling. 'A repulsive force by which they fly from one another.' Newton. 'The repulsive hand of Diomed.' Chapman. — 2. Resisting; withstanding.

The foe thrice tugged, and shook the rooted wood;
Repulsive of his might the weapon stood. Pope.

3. Serving or tending to deter or forbid approach or familiarity; repellent; forbidding; as, repulsive manners; a very repulsive appearance.

Repulsively (ré-pul'siv-ly), adv. In a repulsive manner.

Once more we sit in England's royal throne,
Repurchased with the blood of enemies. Shak.

Repurchase (ré-pér'chás), n. The act of buying again; the purchase again of what has been sold; a new purchase.

Repure (ré-púr'), v.t. To purify or refine again. 'Love's thrice repured nectar.' Shak.

Repurify (ré-pú'rí-fi), v.t. To purify again. Daniel.

Reputable (rep'ú-tá-bl), a. [See REPUTE.] 1. Being in good repute; held in esteem; estimable; as, a reputable man or character; reputable conduct. — 2. Consistent with reputation; not mean or disgraceful.

In the article of danger it is as reputable to chide an enemy as to defeat one. W. Browne.

SYN. Respectable, creditable, honourable, estimable.

Reputableness (rep'ú-tá-bl-ness), n. The quality of being reputable.

Reputably (rep'ú-tá-bl-ly), adv. In a reputable manner; with reputation; without disgrace or discredit; as, to fill an office reputably.

Reputation (rep'ú-tá'shon), n. [Fr. réputation, from L. reputatio, reputatio. See REPUTE.] 1. Account; estimation; consideration. 'For which he held his glory and his renown at no value or reputation.' Chaucer. 2. Character by report; opinion of character generally entertained; character attributed to a person, action, or thing; repute: in a good or bad sense.

Versy, upon the lake of Geneva, has the reputation of being extremely poor and beggarly. Addison.

3. Favourable regard; the credit, honour, or character which is derived from a favourable public opinion or esteem; good name. 'Seeking the bubble reputation even in the cannon's mouth.' Shak.

I see my reputation is at stake. Shak.
At every word a reputation dies. Pope.

SYN. Credit, repute, regard, estimation, esteem, honour, fame.

Reputatively (rep'ú-tá-tiv-ly), adv. By repute. 'Reputatively learned.' Chapman. [Rare.]

Repute (ré-pút'), v.t. pret. & pp. reputed; ppr. reputing. [Fr. reputer, from L. reputo, to count over — re, and puto, to reckon, to estimate (whence compute, inputa, &c.)] 1. To hold in thought; to account; to hold; to reckon; to deem. 'All in England did repute him dead.' Shak.

Wherefore are we counted as beasts, and reputed vile in your sight? Job xviii. 3.

2. To estimate; to value. Shak.

Repute (ré-pút'), n. Reputation; character, good or bad, attributed by public report or opinion; established opinion; specifically, good character; the credit or honour derived from common or public opinion; as, men of repute. 'A knight of old repute.' Tennyson.

He who reigns
Monarch in heaven, till then as one secure,
Sat on his throne upheld by old repute. Milton. — Habit and repute, in Scots law, an expression applied to whatever is held and reputed or generally received as matter of fact; as, a habit and repute thief; a habit and repute marriage.

Reputed (ré-pút'-ed), p. and a. Generally considered or esteemed; generally believed, regarded, or accounted. 'The reputed son of Cordelion.' Shak. — Reputed owner, in law, one who has to all appearances the right and actual possession of property. When a reputed owner becomes bankrupt, all goods and chattels in his possession, with the consent of the true owner, may in general be claimed by the trustee for the benefit of the creditors.

Reputedly (ré-pút'-ed-ly), adv. In common opinion or estimation; by repute.

Reputeless (ré-pút'-les), a. Not having good repute; obscure; inglorious; disreputable; disgraceful. 'Reputeless banishment.' Shak.

Requa-battery (ré'kwá-bat'-ér-ly), n. A kind of mitrailleuse, consisting of a number of rifle breech-loading barrels arranged upon a horizontal plane on a light field carriage, used in the American civil war.

Requere, v.t. To require. Chaucer.

Request (ré-kwest'), n. [O Fr. requeste; Mod. Fr. requête, from L. requisitus, a thing required, a want, a need, from requiro, requisitum — re, again, and quero, queritum, to seek, to look or search for. Requiere, quest, inquisition, &c., all have the same origin.] 1. The expression of desire to some person for something to be granted or done; an asking; a petition; a prayer; an entreaty.

Haman stood up to make request for his life to Esther the queen. Est. vi. 3.

'To what request for what strange boon,' he said,
'Are these your pretty tricks and fooleries,
'O Vivien, the preamble?' Tennyson.

2. The thing asked for or requested.

I will both hear and grant you your request. Shak.
He gave them their request; but sent loaners one their soul. Ps. cxl. 15.

3. A question.

My friend requests.
Which I do not pronounce, in O you wonder!
If you be mad or no. Shak.

4. A state of being desired or held in such estimation as to be sought after, pursued, or asked for. "Coriolanus being now in no request." Shak.

Knowledge and fame were in as great request as wealth among us men. See W. Temple.

Request expresses less earnestness than entreaty and supplication, and supposes a right in the person requested to deny or refuse to grant. In this it differs from demand. — Court of requests in England, a court of equity for the relief of such persons as addressed his majesty by supplication, abolished by stat. 10 and 17 Car. 1. The name was also given to tribunals of a special jurisdiction for the recovery of small debts, which were for the most part abolished by the County Court Act of 1846. — Letters of requests, (a) in eccles. law, an instrument by which the regular judge of a cause allows or permits his own jurisdiction, in which event the cause comes under the jurisdiction of the Court of Arches. (b) Letters formerly granted by the lord privy seal preparatory to granting letters of marque. — See Asking, solicitation, petition, prayer, supplication, entreaty, suit.

Request (ré-kwèst'), v. t. (See the noun.) 1. To make a request for, to ask, to solicit, to express desire for.

The weight of the golden ornaments which he requested was a thousand and seven hundred shekels of gold. Judg. viii. 25.

2. To express a request to, to ask, as, we requested a friend to accompany us. — See To ask, solicit, desire, entreat, beseech.

Requester (ré-kwèst'ér), n. One who requests, a petitioner.

Request-note (ré-kwèst'not'), n. In the inland revenue, an application to obtain a permit for removing excisable articles.

Requiem (ré-kwí-an), v. t. To reanimate, to give new life to. Shak.

Requiem (ré-kwí-an), n. [Acc. case of L. requies, rest, repose, relaxation—re, again, and quies, rest, repose.] 1. A funeral hymn or dirge sung for the repose of the soul of a dead person, a service of mass containing a hymn beginning "Requies aeternam," &c., sung for the dead for the rest of the soul, as called from the first word of the hymn.

We should praise the service of the dead.
To sing a requiem and such peace to her.
As to peace parted soul. Shak.

2. A grand musical composition performed in honour of some deceased person.

The requiem composed by Mozart, Joubert, and Cherubini are well known. See Requiem & Can.

3. Rest, quiet, peace. "Ere had I an eternal requiem here." Shaksp.

Requiescent (ré-kwí-sen-sen), n. (L. L. requiescent, from L. requies, requies, rest, quiet. See above.) A person who "lodies digged up out of their requiescentia."

Rever

Requin (ré-kwín), n. [Fr.] A fish of the shark kind, the Caranx vulgaris or white shark.

Requirable (ré-kwí-er-er), a. Capable of being required, fit or proper to be demanded. See Requit.

Require (ré-kwí-er), v. t. pret. & pp. requir'd; pp. requir'd [O Fr. requerre, requirer, requerre, Mod Fr. requérir, from L. requere, requirere, to search for, to ask for, to need, to require. See Requer.] 1. To demand, to ask or claim, as of right and by authority, to insist on having, to exact.

Why then dost my lord require this thing? (The ask.)
2. To ask as a favour, to request.

I was ashamed to require of the king a band of soldiers and horses to help us against the enemy on the way. Erra will on.

Then, in that time and place I spoke to her.

Expos. mag. at her hand the greatest gift.
A woman's heart, the heart of her I loved. Travellers.

3. To ask or order to do something; to call on, to request.

In humblest manner I require your highness
That it shall please you to declare. Shak.

4. To have need or necessity for, to render necessary or indispensable, to demand, to need, to want, as, the matter requires great care, we require food to support our strength. "For you see my plight requires it." Shak.

God gives us what he knows we want requir'd. Travellers.
To him light labour opened his wholesome store,
Just gave what life required and gave no more. Goldsmith.

5. To find it necessary, to have to: with infinitive, as, you will certainly require to go. — Ask Demand, Claim, Require, Beg, Borrow. See under Ask. — See To claim, exact, enjoy, prescribe, direct, order, demand, need.

Requirement (ré-kwí-er-ment), n. 1. The act of requiring, demand, requisition. — 2. That which requires the doing of something; an authoritative or imperative command, an essential condition, claim. We shall see if an English hound is to harbour and reset the Southrons here.
Sir W. Scott.

Reset (ré-set'), v. t. To set again; as, (a) to give a new setting to; as, to reset a diamond. (b) In printing, to set over again, as a page of matter.

Reset (ré-set'), n. 1. The act of resetting.—2. In printing, matter set over again.

Resettable (ré-set'-á-bl), a. Capable of being reset.

Resetter (ré-set'ér), n. One who resets or places again.

Resetter (ré-set'ér), n. In Scots law, a receiver of stolen goods.

Resettle (ré-set'l'), v. t. and i. To settle again. 'To resettle the minds of those princes.'
Swift.

Resettlement (ré-set'l-ment), n. The act of resettling, or process or state of being resettled; as, (a) the act of settling or composing again. 'The resettlement of my discomposed soul.' Norris. (b) The state of settling or subsiding again; as, the resettlement of seas.

Reshape (ré-sháp'), v. t. To shape again.

Reship (ré-shíp'), v. t. pret. & pp. reshipped; ppr. reshipping. To ship again; to ship what has been conveyed by water or imported; as, coffee and sugar imported into London, and reshipped for Hamburg.

Reshipment (ré-shíp-ment), n. 1. The act of shipping or loading on board a ship a second time; the shipping for exportation what has been imported.—2. That which is reshipped.

Resiance (ré'si-ans), n. [See RESIANT.] Residence; abode. 'Merchant adventurers, which had a resiance in Antwerp.' Bacon.

Resiant (ré'si-ant), a. [O. Fr. reséant, reséant; L. residens, residents. See RESIDENT.] Resident; dwelling; present in a place.

I have already Dealt by Umbrenus, with th' Allobroges
Here resiant in Rome.
B. Jonson.

—Resiant rolls, in law, rolls containing the resiants or residents in a tithing, &c., which were called over by the steward on holding courts-leet.

Resiant (ré'si-ant), n. A resident.
Sir J. Hawkins.

Reside (ré-zíd'), v. i. pret. & pp. resided; ppr. residing. [Fr. résider; L. resideo—re, and sedeo, to sit, to settle down.] 1. To dwell permanently or for a length of time; to have a settled abode for a time; to have one's dwelling or home; to abide continuously, or for a lengthened period.

In no fixed place the happy souls reside;
In groves we live, and lie on mossy beds.
Dryden.

2. To abide or be inherent in, as a quality; to inhere.

In such like acts, the duty and virtue of contentedness doth especially reside. Barrow.

3. † To sink to the bottom of liquors; to settle; to subside. — SYN. To dwell, inhabit, sojourn, abide, remain, live, domiciliate, domicile.

Residence (rez-i-dens), n. [Fr. résidence. See RESIDE.] 1. The act of abiding or dwelling in a place for some continuance of time; as, the residence of an Englishman in France or Italy for a year.

The Confessor had often made considerable residence in Normandy. Sir M. Hale.

2. An abode or abiding place in general; especially, the place where a person resides; place of abode; a dwelling; a habitation. 'Near the residence of Postumus.' Shak.

Within the infant rind of this small flower, Poison hath residence and medicine power. Shak.

Caprea had been . . . the residence of Tiberius for several years. Addison.

3. That in which anything permanently rests.

But when a king sets himself to bandy against the highest court and residence of all his regal power, he then, in the single person of a man, fights against his own majesty and kingship. Milton.

4. † A falling or that which falls to the bottom of liquors; the residuum of a body after any destructive operation.

Divers residences of bodies are thrown away as soon as the distillation or calcination of the body that yielded them is ended. Boyle.

5. A remaining or abiding where one's duties lie; especially, the continuing of a parson or incumbent on his benefice; opposed to non-residence. Under the act 1 and 2 Vict. civ., if an incumbent is absent for one or more periods, exceeding in the whole three calendar months in each year, he will be liable to the penalties for non-residence unless he has obtained a license from the bishop, or is within any of the statutory exemptions. — SYN. Domiciliation, inhabitation, sojourn, stay, abode, home, dwelling, habitation, domicile, mansion.

Residency (rez-i-den-si), n. Residence; specifically, the official residence of a British resident at the court of a native prince in India.

Resident (rez-i-dent), a. [L. residens, residentis, ppr. of resideo. See RESIDE.] 1. Having a seat or dwelling; dwelling or having an abode in a place for a continuance of time; as, he is now resident in the country.

He is not said to be resident in a place who comes thither with a purpose of retiring immediately. Aliff.

2. Fixed; firm. 'The watery pavement is not stable and resident like a rock.' Jer. Taylor.

Resident (rez-i-dent), n. 1. One who resides or dwells in a place for some time; one residing; as, the English residents of Paris; only a visitor not a resident. — 2. A public minister who resides at a foreign court. It is usually applied to ministers of a rank inferior to that of ambassadors. Addison. — 3. In feudal law, a tenant who was obliged to reside on his lord's land, and not to depart from the same. — SYN. Inhabitant, inhabitant, dweller, sojourner.

Residenter (rez-i-dent-er), n. A resident; as, a residenter in a locality.

Residential (rez-i-den-shal), a. Relating or pertaining to residence or to residents.

It is thought that the locality will be much sought after for villa residences, and thus obtain a residential traffic. Ill. London News.

Such I may presume roughly to call a residential extension. Gladiolus.

Residentiality (rez-i-den-sher-i), a. Having residence. Dr. H. More.

Residential (rez-i-den-sher-i), n. 1. One who is resident. 'The residential, or the frequent visitor of the favoured spot.' Cole-ridge. — 2. An ecclesiastic who keeps a certain residence; as, a canon residential.

Residentialship (rez-i-den-sher-i-ship), n. The station of a residential.

Residentship (rez-i-dent-ship), n. The functions or dignity of a resident; the condition or station of a resident. Wood.

Resider (rez-i-d'er), n. One who resides in a particular place.

Residual (rez-i-d'ü-al), a. [L. residuus, from resideo. See RESIDE.] Having the character of a residuum; remaining after a part is taken or dealt with; remaining to be explained or brought under some law.

In using this term ('vital force'), however, it must not be forgotten that we are simply employing a convenient expression for an unknown quantity, for that residual portion of every vital action which cannot at present be referred to the operation of any known physical force. H. A. Newman.

What if species should offer residual phenomena here and there, not explainable by natural selection? Huxley.

— Residual air, the air which remains in the chest and cannot be expelled, variously estimated at from 80 to 120 cubic inches. — Residual charge, a charge of electricity spontaneously acquired by coated glass, or any other coated dielectric after a discharge, owing to the slow return to the surface of that part of the original charge which had penetrated within the dielectric. Faraday.

— Residual figure, in geom. the figure remaining after subtracting a less from a greater. — Residual quantity, in alg. a binomial connected by the sign — (minus); thus $a - b$, $a - \sqrt{b}$, &c., are residual quantities.

Residual (ré-zid'ü-al), n. In math. an expression which gives the remainder of a subtraction, as $a - b$.

Residuary (rez-id'ü-a-ri), a. [L. residuus. See RESIDE.] Pertaining to a residue or part remaining; forming a residue or portion not dealt with; as, residuary estate, the portion of a testator's estate not devised specially. 'The residuary advantage of an estate.' Atlife. — Residuary gun, the dark residuary matter from the treatment of oils and fats in the manufacture of stearine, used in coating fabrics for the manufacture of roofing, &c. — Residuary legatee, in law, the legatee to whom is bequeathed the part of goods and estate which remains after deducting all the debts and specific legacies.

Residue (rez-i-du), n. [Fr. résidu, from L. residuum, what is left behind, from residuum, remaining. See RESIDUAL.] 1. That which remains after a part is taken, separated, removed, or dealt with in some way; that which is still over; remainder; the rest.

And the residue of the families of the sons of Kohath had cities of their coasts out of the tribe of Ephraim. 1 Chr. vi. 64.

The residue of your fortune

Go to my cave and tell me. Shak.

2. In law, the remainder of a testator's estate after payment of debts and legacies.

Residuosity (ré-zid'ü-ös), a. Remaining; residual. Landon.

Residuum (rez-id'ü-um), n. [L.] 1. That which is left after any process of separation or purification; that which remains after other matters have been put aside or treated in some way; a residue.

'I think so' is the whole residuum that can be found after evaporating the prodigious pretensions of the zealot demagogue. Li. Taylor.

2. In law, the part of an estate or of goods and chattels remaining after the payment of debts and legacies. — 3. The vilest and most worthless part of a people; the scum or dregs of society; the rabble. John Bright.

Resiege (ré-séj'), v.t. To seat again; to re-instate.

Resign (ré-zin'), v.t. [Fr. résigner, L. resigno, to assign back, to resign — re, and signo, to mark, mark out, from signum, a mark, token, sign.] 1. To assign back; to return formally; to give up; to give back, as an office or commission, to the person or authority that conferred it; as, an officer resigns his commission; a ministry resigns office; hence, to surrender; to relinquish; to give over. 'Vile earth to earth resign.' Shak. 'Desirous to resign and render back all I received.' Milton.

I here resign my government to thee. Shak.
Phœbus resigns his darts, and Jove
His thunder, to the god of love. Denham.

2. To withdraw, as a claim; to give up; as, he resigns all pretensions to skill. 'Soon resigned his former suit.' Spenser. — 3. To yield or give up in confidence; to submit, particularly to Providence.

What more reasonable than that we should in all things resign ourselves to the will of God? Tillotson.

4. To submit without resistance; to yield; to commit. 'What thou art resign to death.' Shak. — 5. † To intrust; to consign; to commit to the care of.

Gentlemen of quality have been sent beyond the seas, resigned and credited to the conduct of such as they call governors. Swift.

SYN. To surrender, submit, leave, relinquish, forego, quit, forsake, abandon, renounce, abdicate.

Resign (ré-sin'), v.t. To sign again.

Resign (ré-zin'), n. Resignation. Beau. & F.

Resignant (rez-i-g-nant), a. In her. concealed; applied to a lion's tail.

Resignation (rez-i-g-ná'shon), n. 1. The act of resigning or giving up, as a claim, office, place, or possession; as, the resignation of a crown or commission. 'The resignation of thy state and crown.' Shak. — 2. The state of being resigned or submissive; unresisting acquiescence; patience; endurance; particularly, quiet submission to the will of Providence; submission without discontent, and with entire acquiescence in the divine dispensations.

Resignation superadds to patience a submissive disposition respecting the intelligent cause of our uneasiness. It acknowledges both the power and the right of a superior to indict. Cogan.

3. In Scots law, the form by which a vassal returns the feu into the hands of a superior. SYN. Surrender, relinquishment, abandonment, abdication, renunciation, submission, acquiescence, patience, endurance.

Resigned (ré-zind'), p. and a. 1. Surrendered; given up. — 2. Feeling resignation; submissive; patient.

A firm, yet cautious mind;
Sincere, though prudent; constant, yet resigned.

With all my strength I pray'd for both, and so I was resigned. Trantrum.

Resignedly (ré-zin'-ed-li), adv. With resignation; submissively.

Resignee (ré-zin-é), n. In law, the party to whom a thing is resigned.

Resigner (ré-zin-er), n. One who resigns.

Resignment (ré-zin'-ment), n. The act of resigning. 'His full resignation.' Beau. & F.

Resile (ré-zil'), v.t. pret. & pp. resiled; ppr. resiling. [L. resilio, to leap or spring back — re, back, and salio, to leap.] To start back; to recede from a purpose; to recoil. 'The small majority . . . resiling from their own previously professed intention.' Sir W. Hamilton.

The more I resiled from their excessive civilities, the more I was loaded with them. Hume.

Resilience, Resiliency (ré-sil'-en-a, ré-sil'-en-si), n. The act of resiling, leaping, or springing back; the act of rebounding; as, the resilience of a ball or of sound. 'Whether there be any such resilience in echoes.' Bacon. 'The common resiliency of the mind from one extreme to the other.' Johnson.

Resilient (ré-sil'-ent), a. [L. resiliens, resiliens, ppr. of resilio. See RESILE.] Inclined to resile; leaping or starting back; rebounding.

Resilition (ré-sil'-i-shon), n. The act of resiling or springing back; resilience. [Rare.]

Resin (rez-in), n. [Fr. résine, L. resina.] An inflammable substance found in most vegetables, and in almost every part of them. Resins are obtained chiefly in two ways, either by spontaneous exudation from the plants, or by extraction by heat and alcohol. They are entirely insoluble in water, but soluble in ether and the volatile oils, partially soluble in alcohol and the fixed oils, and dissolvable under heat. They are divisible into hard resins and soft resins, the former being solid and brittle at ordinary temperatures, easily pulverized, and containing little or no essential oil; the latter being mouldable by the hand, while some of them are viscous and semi-fluid, in which case they are called balams. When pure, resins are nearly insipid and inodorous. They are non-conductors of electricity, and when excited by friction with a woollen cloth their electricity is negative. They combine with the alkalis of the metals, performing the function of weak acids, and forming soaps. They are soluble in many of the acids, and convertible by some into other peculiar acids. They are composed of carbon, hydrogen, and oxygen, and are supposed to be formed by the oxygenation of the essential oils. There is a great number and variety of the resins. They are valuable as ingredients in varnishes, and several of them are used in medicine. The common resin of commerce exudes in a semi-fluid state from several species of pine. Resins are often naturally blended with gum, in which they constitute the series of gum-resins. See GUM. — Kauri, couree, or coudeé resin, a gum or resin imported from New Zealand, and obtained from the Dawsonia australis, or kauri-pine. See DAMMAR-RESIN. — Resin of aldehyde, a product of the decomposition of the aqueous solution of aldehyde by caustic potash. — Resin of copper, a name given to the protochloride of copper from its resemblance to common resin. — Forest mineral resins, a term applied to amber, petroleum, asphalt, bitumen, and other min-oil, pound; t, Sc. abuse; f, Sc. fep.

eral hydrocarbons. See COLOPHONY, RESIN.

Resinaceous (rez-in-á'shus), a. Resinous; having the quality of resin.

Resinate (rez-in-át), n. A general name for a salt of the acids obtained from turpentine, viz. sylvic, pinic, and pimic acid. The general formulae of these salts are $C_{10}H_{12}MO_4$ and $C_{10}H_{14}M_2O_4$.

Resin-bush (rez-in-bush), n. A colonial South African name for Eurypia speciosa, so called because of a gummy exudation often seen on the stem and leaves.

Resiniferous (rez-in-lí'ér-us), a. [L. resina, and fero, to produce.] Yielding resin; as, a resiniferous tree or vessel.

Resinification (re-sin-i-fí-ká'shon), n. The act or process of treating with resin.

The resinification of the drying oils may be effected by the smallest quantities of certain substances. Ure.

Resiniform (rez-in-i-form), a. Having the form of resin.

Resino-electric (rez-in-ó-élek'trik), a. Containing or exhibiting negative electricity; applied to certain substances, as amber, sealing-wax, &c., which become resinously or negatively electric under friction.

Resinoid (rez-in-oid), a. Resembling resin. Resinous (rez-in-us), a. Pertaining to or obtained from resin; partaking of the qualities of resin; like resin; as, resinous substances.—Resinous electricity, negative electricity, that kind of electricity which is excited by rubbing bodies of the resinous kind with a woollen cloth; in distinction from that excited by rubbing glass, &c., which is termed vitreous or positive electricity.

Resinously (rez-in-us-ly), adv. In the manner of a resinous body; by means of resin; as, resinously electrified.

Resinousness (rez-in-us-ness), n. The quality of being resinous.

Resiny (rez-in-i), a. Like resin, or partaking of its qualities.

Resipiscence (res-i-pis'sens), n. [Fr. resipiscence, from L. resipiscere, from resipio, to recover one's senses, inceptive of resipio—re, again, and resipio, to taste.] Wisdom after the fact; change to a better frame of mind; repentance. [Rare.]

They drew a flattering picture of the resipiscence of the Anglican party. Hallam.

Resist (ré-zíst'), v.t. [Fr. résister, from L. resisto, to withstand—re, and sisto, to cause to stand, to set or place, to stand, from sto, to stand, the root being that of E. stand.] 1. Lit. to stand against; to withstand, so as not to be impressed by; hence, to counteract, as a force by inertia or reaction; to oppose; as, a dam or mound resists a current of water (passively), by standing unmoved and interrupting its progress.

The sword Of Michael from the armoury of God Was given him temper'd so, that neither keen Nor solid might resist that edge. Milton.

2. To act in opposition to; to strive against; to endeavour to counteract, defeat, or frustrate; as, an army resists the progress of an enemy (actively), by encountering and defeating it.

Ye do always resist the Holy Ghost. Ac. vii. 51. Resist the devil, and he will flee from you. Jam. iv. 7.

3. To baffle; to disappoint. God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble. Jam. iv. 6.

4. To be disagreeable or distasteful to; to offend. These cakes resist me, she but thought upon. Shak.

SYN. To withstand, oppose, hinder, check, thwart, baffle, disappoint.

Resist (ré-zíst'), v.t. To make opposition.

He now obeys, and now no more resisteth. While she takes all she can, not all she listeth. Shak.

Resist (ré-zíst'), n. In calico-printing, a sort of paste applied to calico goods to prevent colour or mordant from fixing on those parts not intended to be coloured, either by acting mechanically in preventing the colour, &c., from reaching the cloth, or chemically in changing the colour so as to render it incapable of fixing itself in the fibres. Called also Resist-paste and Reserve.—Resist-work, calico with a blue ground and white patches or spots.

Sir Robert Peel was quick to appreciate the value of all new processes and inventions, in illustration of which we may allude to his adoption of the process for producing what is called resist-work in calico-printing. This is accomplished by the use of a paste, or resist, on such parts of the cloth as are to remain white. Smiles.

Resistance (ré-zíst-ans), n. 1. The act of resisting; opposition. Resistance is passive, as that of a fixed body which interrupts the passage of a moving body; or active, as in the exertion of force to stop, repel, or defeat, progress or designs.

Nevertheless there is none so perfect in this life that findeth not let and resistance by the reason of original sin. Tyndale.

In the middle ages resistance was an ordinary remedy for political distempers, a remedy which was always at hand, and though doubtless sharp at the moment produced no deep or lasting ill effects. Macaulay.

2. In physics, the quality or property in matter of not yielding to force or external impression; that power of a body which acts in opposition to the impulse or pressure of another, or which prevents the effect of another power; as, the resistance of air to the motion of a cannon-ball, or of water to the motion of a ship. The resistance produced by the rubbing of the surfaces of two bodies against each other, caused by the asperities or inequalities of the rubbing surfaces, is called friction (which see).—Resistance or resisting force, in physics, denotes, generally, a force acting in opposition to another force so as to destroy it, or diminish its effect. It is a power by which motion, or a tendency to motion in any body, is retarded or prevented. Resistance is sometimes considered as of two kinds, active and passive, the first being that which corresponds to the useful effect produced by a machine, and the second that which arises from the inertia of the machine.—Resistance coil, in teleg. a coil usually of a material of a less conducting power than the main circuit, introduced into a circuit to increase the resistance.—Electric resistance, the force required to electrify a given body, and therefore the opposition to the passage of a current.—Solid of least resistance, in mech. the solid whose figure is such that in its motion through a fluid it sustains the least resistance of all others having the same length and base; or, on the other hand, being stationary in a current of fluid, offers the least interruption to the progress of that fluid. In the former case it has been considered the best form for the stem of a ship; in the latter the proper form for the pier of a bridge. The problem of finding the solid of least resistance was first proposed and solved by Newton.—Unit of resistance, in elect. the standard of measurement of electric resistance. The unit adopted by the British Association is called an ohm (which see); it is about equal to the resistance of a round copper wire 485 metres long and 1 millimetre in diameter. The French unit of resistance equals nearly 9 ohms.—SYN. Opposition, antagonism, hindrance, check.

Resistant (ré-zíst-ant), n. One who or that which resists.

According to the decrees of power in the agent and resistant is an action performed or hindered. Sp. Fearson.

Resistant, Resistent (ré-zíst-ant, ré-zíst-ent), a. Making resistance; resisting.

Resister (ré-zíst-ér), n. One who resists; one who opposes or withstands. 'Resisters of God's spirit.' South.

Resistful (ré-zíst'fúl), a. Resisting.

Resistibility (ré-zíst'i-bíl'i-ti), n. 1. Quality of being resistible; as, the resistibility of grace.—2. The quality of resisting.

The name body, being the complex idea of extension and resistibility together in the same subject, these two ideas are not exactly one and the same. Lacks.

Resistible (ré-zíst'i-bl), a. Capable of being resisted; as, a resistible force; resistible grace.

Resistibleness (ré-zíst'i-bl-ness), n. The quality of being resistible; resistibility.

Resistibly (ré-zíst'i-blí), adv. In a resistible manner.

Resisting (ré-zíst'ing), p. and a. Withstanding; opposing.—Resisting force. See under RESISTANCE.—Resisting medium, a substance which opposes the passage of a body through it. Specifically, in astron. an exceedingly rare medium supposed to be diffused through space; ether (which see).

Resistingly (ré-zíst'ing-ly), adv. With resistance or opposition; so as to resist.

Resistive (ré-zíst'iv), a. Having the power to resist. B. Johnson.

Resistless (ré-zíst'les), a. 1. Incapable of being resisted, opposed, or withstood; irresistible. 'A power resistless.' Milton. 'Resistless in her love as in her hate.' Dryden. 2. Powerless to resist; helpless.

Resistless, tame. Am I to be burned up? No I will shout Until the gods through heaven's blue look out. Keats.

Resistlessly (ré-zíst'les-ly), adv. In a resistless manner; so as not to be opposed or denied.

Resistlessness (ré-zíst'les-ness), n. State of being resistless or irresistible.

Resist-paste (ré-zíst'pást), n. See RESIST.

Resmooth (ré-amóth'), v.t. To make smooth again; to smooth out.

And thus your pains May only make that foot-print upon sand Which old-recurring waves of prejudice Resmooth to nothing. Tennyson.

Resold (ré-sóld'), pp. of resell. Sold a second time, or sold after being bought.

Resolder (ré-sól'dér), v.t. To solder or mend again; to rejoin; to make whole again. 'Resolder'd peace.' Tennyson.

Resolvable (rez'o-lú-bl), a. [Fr. résolvable.] Capable of being resolved, melted, or dissolved; as, bodies resolvable by fire.

Resolubleness (rez'o-lú-bl-ness), n. Quality of being resolvable.

Resolute (rez'o-lút), a. [Fr. résolu, pp. of résoudre, to resolve. See RESOLVE.] 1. Having a fixed purpose; determined; hence, bold; firm; steady; constant in pursuing a purpose.

Edward is at hand, Ready to fight; therefore be resolute. Shak.

2.† Convinced; satisfied; certain.—3.† Resolving; convincing; satisfying. 'I have given resolute answer.' Foote.—SYN. Determined, decided, fixed, steadfast, firm, steady, constant, persevering, bold, unshaken.

Resolute (rez'o-lút), n. 1. A resolute or determined person. Young Fortinbras

Hath, in the skirts of Norway, here and there, Sharped up a list of landless resolute. Shak.

2. Repayment; redelivery. 'Yearly resolute.' Burnet.

Resolutely (rez'o-lút-ly), adv. In a resolute manner; with fixed purpose; firmly; steadily; with steady perseverance; boldly; as, persist resolutely in a course of virtue.

Some of these facts he examines, some he resolutely denies. Swift.

Resoluteness (rez'o-lút-ness), n. The quality of being resolute; fixed purpose; firm determination; unshaken firmness.

Resolution (rez-o-lú'shon), n. [Fr. résolution, from L. resolutio. See RESOLVE.] 1. The act, operation, or process of resolving; as, (a) the act of separating the component parts of a body, as by chemical means. (b) The act of separating the parts which compose a complex idea. (c) The act of unravelling a perplexing question, a difficult problem, or the like; explication.

The unravelling and resolution of the difficulties that are met with in the execution of the design, are the end of an action. Dryden.

2. The state or process of dissolving; dissolution; solution. Sir K. Digby.—3. The state of being resolved or determined; a fixed purpose or determination of mind; a settled purpose; as, a resolution to reform our lives; a resolution to undertake an expedition.

Your resolution cannot hold, when 'tis Opposed, as it must be, by the power of the king. Shak.

4. The quality or character of acting with fixed purpose; resoluteness; firmness, steadiness, or constancy in execution; determination; as, a man of great resolution.

They who governed the parliament, had the resolution to act those monstrous things. Clarendon.

5. A formal determination or decision of a legislative or corporate body, or of any association of individuals; a formal proposition brought before a public body for discussion and adoption; as, the resolutions of a public meeting.

Every question, when agreed to, assumes the form either of an order or a resolution of the house (Parliament). By its orders the house directs its committees, its members, its officers, the order of its own proceedings, and the acts of all persons whom they may concern; by its resolutions, the house declares its own opinions and purposes. Sir E. May.

6. Determination of a cause in a court of justice; as, a judicial resolution. Sir M. Hale. [This word is now seldom used to express the decision of a judicial tribunal; we use judgment, decision, or decree.]

7. The state of being settled in opinion; freedom from doubt; conviction; certainty.—8. The state of being relaxed; relaxation; a weakening. 'The resolution and languor ensuing.' Sir T. Browne.—9. In music, the succession of a concord immediately after a discord, by raising or depressing a note a tone or a semitone, according to the rules of harmonical progression.—10. In med. a removal or disappearance, as the disappearing of a tumour without coming to suppuration, the dispersing of inflammation, the breaking up and disappearance of fever.—11. In math. the orderly enumeration of the things to be done to obtain what is required in a problem. A problem may be divided into three parts—the proposition, the resolution or solution, and the demonstration.—Resolution of an equation, in alg. the bringing of the unknown quantity by itself on one side, and all the known quantities on the other, without destroying the equation, by which is found the value of the unknown quantity; the reduction of an equation.—Resolution of forces or of motion, in dyn. the dividing of any single force or motion into two or more others, which, acting in different directions, shall produce the same effect as the given motion or force. This is the reverse of composition of forces or of motion. Thus, let A B represent the quantity and direction of some given force; draw any lines A C, A D, and join C B, D B, and complete the parallelograms A D B E, A C B F. Then by composition of forces the force A B is equivalent to A D and A E, or to A C and A F. Hence it is evident that a given force, as A B, may be resolved into as many pairs of forces as there can be triangles described upon a given straight line A B, or parallelograms about it. And as the forces represented by A D, D B, or A C, C B, may also be resolved into other pairs of forces, it appears that by proceeding in the same manner with the successive pairs of forces a given force may be resolved into an unlimited number of others, acting in all possible directions. See COMPOSITION, FORCE, RESULTANT.—Resolution of nebulae. See under RESOLVE, v. t.—Decision, Determination, Resolution. See under DECISION.—SYN. Analysis, separation, disentangling, dissolution, resolvedness, resoluteness, firmness, constancy, perseverance, steadfastness, fortitude, boldness, decision, purpose, resolve.

Respiration (res-pi-rá'shon), n. [L. respiratio, respiratio, from respiro. See RESPIRE.] 1. † The act of breathing again or resuming life.

Till the day
Appear of respiration to the just,
Or vengeance to the wicked. Milton.

2. The act of respiring or breathing; the function by which the nutrient circulating fluid of an organized body is submitted to the influence of air for the purpose of changing its properties. The respiratory function in animals may be mainly considered to be devoted to the excretion of carbonic acid, and to the absorption or inhalation of oxygen gas, by which process the dingy hued venous blood becomes converted into the florid red arterial blood. In the more highly organized animals respiration is carried on by the lungs; in fishes it is effected by the gills. Respiration includes inspiration or inhalation of air, and expiration or exhalation, the combined process taking place in the healthy adult human subject about fourteen to eighteen times per minute, the average quantity of air inhaled being about 30 cubic inches, a slightly smaller quantity being exhaled. Respiration goes on in plants as well as in animals, plants in the presence of light exhaling oxygen and inhaling carbonic acid, and thus reversing the action of the animal. The respiration of fishes (for these cannot live long without air) is effected by the air contained in the water acting on the gills. 3. † Interval. Bp. Hall.—Artificial respiration, respiration induced by artificial means. It is required in cases of drowning, the inhalation of chloroform, noxious gases, and the like. In the case of a person apparently drowned, or in an asphyxiated condition, the following treatment has been recommended:—The patient should be laid on his back on a plane inclined a little from the feet upwards; the shoulders gently raised by a firm cushion placed under them; the tongue brought forward so as to project a little from the side of the mouth. The arms should then be grasped just above the elbows, and raised till they nearly meet above the head: this action imitates inspiration. The arms are then turned down, and firmly pressed for a moment against the sides of the chest; thus imitating a deep expiration.

These two sets of movements should be perseveringly repeated at the rate of fifteen times in a minute.

Respirational (res-pi-rá'shon-al), a. Relating to respiration.

Respirator (res-pi-rát-ér), n. An instrument for breathing through, fitted to cover the mouth, or the nose and mouth, over which it is secured by proper bandages or other appliances. They are mostly used to exclude the passage into the lungs of cold air, smoke, dust, and other noxious substances, and are chiefly used by persons having delicate chests, firemen, cutlers, grinders, and the like. Respirators for persons with weak lungs have several piles of fine gauze made of highly heat-conducting metal, which warms the air as it passes through.

Respiratory (res-pi-rá-to-ri or ré-spi-r'a-to-ri), a. Pertaining to or serving for respiration; as, respiratory organs.—Respiratory nerves, a series of nerves proceeding from a narrow white fasciculus, situated between the corpus olivare and the corpus retiforme, in the medulla oblongata, and appropriated to the function of respiration.—Respiratory sounds, the sounds made by the air when being inhaled or exhaled. When the lungs are healthy two distinct sounds are heard on applying the ear to the chest, or to a stethoscope applied to the chest, viz the vesicular sound, otherwise called the respiratory murmur, caused by inspiration, and the bronchial sound produced by the air passing through the bronchial tubes. In a diseased state of the lungs and tubes these sounds are modified, the vesicular sound becoming weaker in one part of the lungs, and abnormally strong in the remainder, and the healthy bronchial sound being changed into one of certain sounds called by the French râles or rattles. The respiratory sounds are of the highest importance in the diagnosis of diseases of the chest and bronchial tubes.—Respiratory surface, the surface of the lungs that comes in contact with the air. This surface is extended by minute subdivision of the lungs into small cavities or air-cells.

Respire (ré-spir'), v. i. pret. & pp. respired; ppr. respiring. [Fr. respirer, L. respiro—re, and spiro, to breathe (whence spirit).] 1. To breathe; to inhale air into the lungs and exhale it, for the purpose of maintaining animal life.—2. To catch breath; to recover breath.

Till breathless both themselves aside retire;

In music, an interval of silence occurring in the course of a movement between one sound and another, or the mark or character denoting the interval. The duration of a rest, like the duration of a tone, is indicated by the form of the character representing it, and each note has its corresponding rest. The rests most frequently met with in modern music are:

Breve.	Semibreve.	Minim.	Crotchet.	Quaver.	Semi-quaver.	Demi-semiquaver.	Semidemi-semiquaver.	Dotted Crotchet.	Rest.
—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—

A rest like a note may be prolonged by one or more dots.—8. † A syllable. B. Jonson. 9. In Aer, the name given to a figure of doubtful import. It has its name from being taken for a spear-rest, but its shape rather suggests a musical instrument, wherefore it has been called an organ-rest. It is not improbably the representation of some instrument like Pan's pipea.—10. † A set, game, or match at tennis.

For wit is like a rest
Held up at tennis, when men do the best
With the best gamsters. Beaumont.

Knock me down, if ever I saw a rest of wit better played than that last in my life. Cibber.

—To set up one's rest, an old phrase borrowed from the once fashionable and favourite game of primero, meaning to stand upon the cards in one's hand in the hopes that they may prove stronger than those of an opponent; hence, to make up one's mind; to stake one's chances; to fix or place one's hope.

They therefore resolved to set up their rest upon that stake, and to go through with it or perish in the attempt. Clarendon.

For the next night, I warrant,
The County Paris hath set up his rest
That you shall rest but little. Shak.

Sea fights have been final to the war, but this is when princes set up their rest upon the battle. Bacon.

SYN. Cessation, pause, intermission, stop, stay, repose, slumber, quiet, ease, quietness, stillness, tranquillity, peacefulness, peace. Rest (rest), v. t. [A. Sax. restan, to rest, to be quiet; D. rusten, G. rasten, Sw. rasta. From the noun. See REST, repose.] 1. To cease from action, motion, work, or performance of any kind; to stop.

He rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made. Gen. ii. 2.

Restraiment (rê-strân'ment), n. Act of restraining.

Restraint (rê-strânt'), n. [O.Fr. restrainte, Mod. Fr. restraint, pp. of restrindre. See RESTRAIN.] 1. The act or operation of holding back or hindering from motion in any manner; hindrance of the will, or of any action physical, moral, or mental.

Thus it shall befall
Him, who, to worth in woman overtrusting,
Lets her will rule; restraint she will not brook. Milton.

Is there anything which reflects a greater lustre upon a man's person than a severe temperance, and a restraint of himself from vicious pleasures? South.

2. Abridgment of liberty; confinement; detention.

1. . . heartily request
The enfranchisement of Arthur, whose restraint
Doth more the murning lips of discontent. Shak.

3. That which restrains, limits, hinders, or represses; a limitation, restriction, or prohibition; as, laws are designed to be restraints on the vicious.

Say first, what cause
Moved our grandparents, in that happy state,
Favour'd of Heaven so highly, to fall off
From their Creator, and transgress his will,
For one restraint, lords of the world besides? Milton.

SYN. Repression, hindrance, check, stop, curb, coercion, confinement, limitation, restriction.

Restrict (rê-strîkt'), v.t. [L. restringo, restringo—re, back, and stringo, to draw or to tight.] 1. To limit; to confine; to restrain within bounds; as, to restrict words to a particular meaning; to restrict a patient to a certain diet.

The common law of England, indeed, is said to abhor perpetuities, and they are accordingly more restricted there than in any other European monarchy. Adam Smith.

[Dr. Johnson regarded this word as 'scarce English' in his time; but it was in use long before (as also restriction), being employed by Foxe, the martyrologist.]

Restriction (rê-strîkt'shon), n. [L. restrictio, restrictio. See RESTRICT.] 1. The act of restricting, or state of being restricted; limitation; confinement within bounds; as, grounds open to the public without restriction.

This is to have the same restriction as all other recreations. Dr. H. More.

2. That which restricts; a restraint; as, to impose restrictions on trade.—3. Reservation; reserve.—Real restriction, the use of words which are not true if strictly interpreted, but which contain no deviation from truth if the circumstances be considered.—Mental restriction. Resultant (rê-zult'ant), a. Existing or following as a result or consequence; especially, resulting from the combination of two or more agents; as, a resultant motion produced by two forces.

Resultant (rê-zult'ant), n. 1. In dyn. the force which results from the composition of two or more forces acting upon a body. When the two forces act upon a body in the same line of direction, the resultant is equivalent to the sum of both; when they act in opposite directions, the resultant is equal to their difference, and acts in the direction of the greater. If the lines of direction of the two forces are inclined to each other, then on taking in each direction, from the point where they intersect, a straight line to represent each of the forces respectively, and constructing a parallelogram, of which these lines are the adjacent sides, the resultant is represented in intensity and direction by the diagonal of the parallelogram passing through the point of intersection. By combining this resultant with a third force a new resultant will be obtained, and in this manner the resultant of any number of forces may be determined.—2. In math. an eliminant (which see).

Resultate (rê-zult'ât), n. A result. The results of their counsel is for the most part direct and sincere. Bacon.

Resultful (rê-zult'fûl), a. Having results; effectual.

Beloved Julia, hear me still beseeching!
Here he grew inarticulate with retching. Byron.

[Byron would therefore seem to have pronounced the word rech.]

Retch (rech), v. t. and i. [Weakened form of rech.] To retch; to heave; to care for. Homage of the Rose.

Reckless (rech'les), a. [An old weakened form of reckless (which see).] Reckless; careless.

This said, he flung his reckless arms abroad,
And groveling flat upon the ground he lay. Mir. for Mags.

Recklessly (rech'les-ly), adv. Recklessly. Drayton.

Recklessness (rech'les-ness), n. Recklessness; carelessness. 'Thus, well they may upbraid our recklessness.' Daniel.

Reck (rech), n. [L. rete, a net.] In anat. a vascular net-work or plexus of vessels. — Reck mirabile, a net-work of blood-vessels in the basis of the brain. — Reck mucosum, in anat. a tissue lying between the epidermis or scarf-skin and the cutis vera or true skin. It is the seat of the colour of the skin, and contains black pigment in the negro.

Reckulous (rech'ulous), a. Resembling net-work. [Rare.]

Recktion (rē-tek'shon), n. [From L. re-cto, refection, to uncover — re, back, and cto, to cover.] The act of disclosing or producing to view something concealed.

This is rather a refection of a body by its own colour, or a refection of its native colour, than a change. Boyle.

Retell (rē-tel'), v. t. To tell again.

Retent (rē-tent'), n. That which is retained. Retention (rē-ten'shon), n. [Fr. retention, from L. retentio, retentionis, from retinere, to retain. See RETAIN.] 1. The act of retaining or keeping; the state of being retained. 'A froward retention of custom.' Bacon. — 2. The power of retaining, especially, the faculty of the mind by which it retains ideas, memory. 'No woman's heart so big to hold so much, they lack retention.' Shak.

The next chapter [of Locke's second Essay] treats of retention which is the same as memory, and which we see, at once, can only occupy itself with ideas already in the mind. J. D. Morrell.

Hence — 3. That which preserves impressions, as a tablet. 'That poor retention could not so much hold.' Shak. [Rare.] — 4. In med. (a) the power of retaining, as in the stomach or bladder. (b) A morbid accumulation of solid or liquid matter in vessels of the body or cavities intended to contain it only for a time. — 5. The act of withholding, reserve, restraint.

His life I gave him, and did thereto add
My love without retention or restraint. Shak.

6. The state of being confined; custody; confinement.

To send the old and miserable king
To some retention and appointed guard. Shak.

7. In Scots law, a lien; the right of withholding a debt or retaining property until a debt due to the person claiming this right be duly paid.

Retentive (rē-tent'iv), a. [L. ablative pl. of retentus, pp. of retinere, to hold back. See RETAIN.] Things retained. To be kept in retentive, to be kept among things retained or reserved for some future purpose. To lie in retentive, in Scots law, to lie in proof, as the examinations of witnesses, which, in certain cases, are taken before the case is ripe for trial.

Retentive (rē-tent'iv), a. [Fr. retentif. See RETAIN.] Having the power to retain; as, a retentive memory; the retentive faculty; the retentive force of the stomach, a body retentive of heat or moisture.

Not silent dungeon, nor strong links of iron,
Can be retentive to the strength of spirit. Shak.

Retentive (rē-tent'iv), n. That which retains or confines; restraint.

Secret checks readily conspire with outward restraint. By Hall.

Retentively (rē-tent'iv-ly), adv. In a retentive manner.

Retentiveness (rē-tent'iv-ness), n. The quality of being retentive; as, retentiveness of memory.

Retenus, n. Retinna. — At his retenus, retained by him. Chaucer.

Retepora (rē-tē-pō-rā), n. [L. rete, a net, and pora, a pore.] A genus of zoophytes of the class Polyzoa. Retepora are immersed in a flattened foliaceous expansion pierced like net-work. The typical species (R. cellulosa), found in the Indian and Mediterranean Seas, is known by the name of Retepora cellulosa.

Neptune's ruffles. Fossil species occur in all formations.

Retepore (rē-tē-pō-rē), n. One of the Retepora.

Retext (rē-tek's), v. t. [L. retexo, to unweave.] To unweave; to disentangle. By Hecker.

Retexture (rē-tek's-tūr), n. The act of weaving again; a second or new texture. 'Retexture of spiritual tissues.' Carlyle.

Rethor, n. [Gr. rhētor] An orator or rhetorician. Chaucer.

Retiarium (rē-ti-ā-ri-ūm), n. pl. [L. from rete, a net.] The name given to those spiders which spin a web to entrap their prey.

Retiarius (rē-ti-ā-ri-ūm), n. [L. from rete, a net.] In Rom. antiq. a gladiator who wore only a short tunic and carried a trident and net. With these implements he endeavoured to entangle and despatch his adversary, who was armed with a helmet, a shield, and sword.

Retiary (rē-ti-ā-ri), a. 1. Netlike. 'Retiary or hanging textures.' Sir T. Browne. 2. Net-making; constructing or using a net or web to catch prey. 'Retiary spiders.' Sir T. Browne. — 3. Armed with a net, hence, skilful to entangle. 'Scholastic retiary verbiage of logic.' Coleridge.

Retiary (rē-ti-ā-ri), n. 1. A gladiator. See RETIARIUS. — 2. In zool. a spider which spins a web to catch its prey. See RETIARIUS.

Retice (rē-ti-sē), n. [Fr. reticence, from L. reticentia, from reticere, to be silent again — re, again, and ticere, to be silent.] 1. The quality of being reticent or of observing studied and continued silence, a refraining from talking; the keeping of one's counsel. 'A reticence or keeping silence.' Holland.

Such a man must have reticence in him, if he walk wearing his heart upon his sleeve. Carlyle.

2. In rhet. aposiopesis (which see).

Retice (rē-ti-sē), n. Reticence.

Retice (rē-ti-sē), a. [L. reticens, reticens, pp. of reticere. See RETICENCE.] Having a disposition to be silent, reserved, not apt to speak about or reveal any matters, as, he is very reticent about his affairs.

Upon this he is naturally reticent. Lamb.

Reticle (rē-tik'l), n. [L. reticulum, dim. of rete, a net.] 1. A small net. — 2. A reticle; a hand-bag. [Rare.] — 3. Same as reticula. 2. Reticular (rē-tik'ū-lar), a. [See above.] Having the form of a net or of net-work, formed with interstices, as, a reticular body or membrane. — The reticular body, or rete mucosum. See RETE. — Reticular membrane, substance, or tissue. Same as Cellular Membrane or Tissue. See CELLULAR.

Reticularia (rē-tik'ū-lār-i-ā), n. pl. Same as Reticulosa.

Reticularly (rē-tik'ū-lar-ly), adv. In a reticular manner. 'The outer surface of the chorion is reticularly ridged.' Owen.

Reticulate, Reticulated (rē-tik'ū-lāt, rē-tik'ū-lāt-ed), a. [L. reticulatus, from reticulum, dim. of rete, a net.] Netted; resembling net-work, having distinct lines crossing each other like net-work; in bot. and zool. having distinct lines or veins crossing like net-work; as, a reticulated leaf, in mineral applied to minerals occurring in parallel fibres, crossed by other fibres which are also parallel, so as to exhibit meshes like those of a net. — Reticulated glass, a kind of ornamental glassware in which a network of air-bubbles is inclosed in the glass and arranged in regular interlacing series.

Reticulated micrometer. See RETICULE, 2. MICROMETER. — Reticulated mounding, in arch. a member composed of a fillet interlaced in various ways like net-work. It is seen chiefly in buildings in the Norman style. Reticulated work, that variety of masonry wherein the stones are square and laid lozenge-wise, resembling the meshes of a net. This species of masonry was very common among the ancients.

Reticulated Work—Roman.

Reticulation (rē-tik'ū-lā'shon), n. 1. The state of being reticulated or netlike; that which is reticulated, net-work; organization of substances resembling a net.

Your account of the particular net upon which the great reticulation is not very satisfactory. Carlyle.

2. A method of copying a painting or drawing by the help of threads stretched across a frame so as to form squares, an equal number of proportional squares being made on the canvas or paper on which the copy is to be made.

Reticule (rē-tik'ū-l), n. [Fr. reticule, L. reticulum, dim. of rete, a net.] 1. A kind of bag, formerly of net-work, but now of every description of materials, used by ladies for carrying in the hand. — 2. An attachment to a telescope, used for measuring small celestial distances. It consists of an eye-piece of low power, having a net-work of some fine fibres crossing each other at right angles, and dividing the field of view into a series of small equal squares, a reticulated micrometer. — 3. Same as Reticulum, 1.

Reticulosa (rē-tik'ū-lō'sā), n. pl. A term employed by Dr. Carpenter to designate those Protozoa, such as the Foraminifera, in which the pseudopodia run into one another and form a net-work.

Reticulum (rē-tik'ū-lum), n. [L. reticulum, a little net.] 1. The honey-comb bag, or second cavity of the complex stomach of the ruminant quadrupeds. — 2. In bot. the fibrous debris at the base of the petioles of some palms.

the parts naturally the undermost become the uppermost, and vice versa; as, a resupinate corolla; a resupinate leaf.

Resupinated (rê-sû'pî-nâ-ted), a. Resupinate.

Resupination (rê-sû'pî-nâ'shon), n. [See above.] The state of lying on the back; the state of being resupinate or reversed. 'A resupination of the figure.' Wotton.

Resupine (rê-sû'pîn'), a. Lying on the back. He spake, and downward swayed, fell resupine, With his huge neck aslant. Cowper.

Resupply (rê-sûp-plî'), v. t. To supply again. Southey.

Resurgence (rê-sêr'jens), n. The act of rising again; resurrection. Coleridge.

Resurgent (rê-sêr'jent), a. [L. resurgens, resurgens, ppr. of resurgo—re, again, and surgo, to rise.] Rising again or from the dead. Coleridge.

Resurgent (rê-sêr'jent), n. One who or that which rises again; especially, one who rises from the dead. Sydney Smith.

The process of this action drew on a resurprise of the castle by the Thebans. Bacon.

Resurprise (rê-sêr-prîz'), v. t. To surprise again; to retake unawares.

Resurrect (rez-êr-ekt'), v. t. [See RESURRECTION.] 1. To take from the grave, as a dead body. [Low.]—2. To restore to life; to reanimate; to bring to public view that which had been lost or forgotten.

Resurrection (rez-êr-ek'shon), n. [Fr. from L. resurrectio, from L. resurgo, resurrectum—re, again, and surgo, to arise.] 1. A rising again; a springing again into life; a revival, as from a state of ignorance or degradation; as, the resurrection of hopes; a moral resurrection; specifically, a rising from the dead; the revival of the dead of the human race, or their return from the grave, particularly at the general judgment. 'A glorious and joyful resurrection.' Addison.

And have hope toward God . . . that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust. Acts xiv. 15.

2. The state of being risen from the dead; the future state.

In the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage. Mat. xxii. 30.

Resurrectionist (rez-êr-ek'shon-ist), n. One whose business it is to steal bodies from the grave for dissection.

Resurrectionize (rez-êr-ek'shon-iz), v. t. To raise from the dead; to resurrect. Southey.

Resurrection-man (rez-êr-ek'shon-man), n. Same as Resurrectionist. Dickens.

Resurvey (rê-sêr-vâ'), v. t. 1. To survey again or anew; to review.—2. To read and examine again.

Once more resurvey These poor rude lines of thy deceased lover. Shak.

Resurvey (rê-sêr-vâ'), n. A new survey.

Resuscitate (rê-sûs'i-tâ-bl), a. Capable of being resuscitated or restored to life.

Resuscitant (rê-sûs'i-tant), a. and n. Resuscitating; one who or that which resuscitates.

Resuscitate (rê-sûs'i-tât), v. t. pret. & pp. resuscitated; ppr. resuscitating. [L. resuscito, resuscitatus—re, again, and suscito, to rouse up—sus, sub, and cito, to put into quick motion, to incite, to stimulate, a freq. from cio, to summon, to make to go.] 1. To stir up anew; to revivify; to revive; particularly, to recover from apparent death; as, to resuscitate a drowned person; to resuscitate withered plants. 'After death we should be resuscitated.' Glanville.

It is difficult to resuscitate surprise when familiarity has once laid the sentiment asleep. Paley.

No wind has resuscitated the face of the sleeping waters. Lamb.

Resuscitate (rê-sûs'i-tât), v. i. To revive; to come to life again.

As these projects, however often slain, always resuscitate, it is not superfluous to examine one or two of the fallacies by which the schemers impose on themselves. F. S. Mill.

Resuscitation (rê-sûs'i-tâ'shon), n. The act of resuscitating, or the state of being resuscitated; revival; revivification; restoration to life; the restoring to animation of persons apparently dead, as in cases of drowning, suspended animation from exposure to cold, or from disease. 'The extinction and resuscitation of arts.' Johnson.

The resuscitation of the body from its dust is a supernatural work. Bp. Hall.

Resuscitative (rê-sûs'i-tât-iv), a. Tending to resuscitate; reviving; revivifying; raising from apparent death; reproducing.

Resuscitator (rê-sûs'i-tât-êr), n. One who resuscitates.

Ret (ret), v. t. [D. reten, to ret flax; allied to rot.] To steep or macerate flax in water, after it is taken from the field, in order to separate the fibre by incipient rotting.

Retable (rê-tâ'bl), n. In arch. a shelf or ledge behind an altar for holding candles or vases. Sometimes called Super-altar.

Retail (rê-tâl'), v. t. [Fr. retailer, to cut again, to cut often, retail, a piece cut off—re, again, and tailer, to cut, from L. tales, a tale, a tally, from L. tales, a stick, a bar (hence also detail, tailor, tally). Retail is thus to sell by pieces cut off.] 1. To sell in small quantities or parcels: opposed to selling by wholesale; as, to retail cloth or groceries.

The keepers of ale-houses pay for a licence to retail ale and spirituous liquors. Adam Smith.

2. To sell at second hand.

The sage dame, experienced in her trade, By names of toasts, retails each batter'd Jade. Pope.

3. To deal out in small quantities; to tell in broken parts; to tell to many; to tell again; to hand down by report; as, to retail slander or idle reports.

He thinks the truth should live from age to age, As 'twere retail'd to all posterity. Shak.

Retail (rê-tâl), n. The sale of commodities in small quantities or parcels, or at second hand; a dealing out in small portions. 'These and most other things which are sold by retail.' Adam Smith.

Retail (rê-tâl'), a. Applied to the sale of anything in small quantities or parcels; as, a retail trade. Sydney Smith.

Retailer (rê-tâl'êr), n. One who retails; one who deals out in small quantities.

The profits of the farmer, of the manufacturer, of the merchant and retailer, are all drawn from the price of the goods which the two first produce, and the two last buy and sell. Adam Smith.

Retainment (rê-tâl'ment), n. Act of retaining.

Retain (rê-tân'), v. t. [Fr. retenir, L. retineo—re, back, and teneo, to hold.] 1. To hold or keep in possession; to keep from departure or escape; to hold; to detain; to keep; not to lose or part with or dismiss; as, the memory retains ideas which facts or arguments have suggested to the mind. 'Whom I would have retained with me.' Phil. xiii. 13.

They did not like to retain God in their knowledge. Rom. i. 28.

An executor may retain a debt due to him from the testator. Blackstone.

Still Hebron's honour'd, happy soil retains Our royal hero's beauteous, dear remains. Dryden.

2. To keep in pay; to hire; to engage by the payment of a preliminary fee; as, to retain counsel.

A Benedictine convent has now retained the most learned father of their order to write in its defence. Addison.

3. To withhold; to restrain; to keep back.

He laid him bleeding on the ground, and had killed him if his brother Robert had not retained him, and made him sensible how much more it concerned him to make his escape than pursue his revenge. Sir W. Temple.

Retain (rê-tân'), v. i. 1. To belong to; to depend on; to pertain. 'A somewhat languid relish retaining to bitterness.' Boyle.

2. To keep; to continue.

No more can I impure man retain and move In the pure region of that worthy love. Donne.

Retainable (rê-tân'a-bl), a. Capable of being retained.

Retainal (rê-tân'al), n. The act of retaining. Annual Review. [Rare.]

Retainership (rê-tân'dêr-ship), n. The state of being a retainer or dependant.

It was the policy of these kings to make them all (clergy and nobility) of their own livery or retainership. N. Bacon.

Retainer (rê-tân'êr), n. 1. One who or that which retains. 'One that has forgot the common meaning of words, but an admirable retainer of the sound.' Swift.—2. One who is kept in service; an attendant; a dependant; in a specific sense, a servant, not a domestic, but occasionally attending and wearing his master's livery; as, the retainers of the ancient princes and nobility.

In common law, retainer signifieth a servant not menial nor familiar, that is, not dwelling in his house; but only using or bearing his name and livery. Cowell.

Still less would the vast body of tenants and their retainers, who were fed at the castle in time of peace, refuse to carry their pikes and staves into the field of battle. Haliam.

3. In law, (a) a preliminary fee given to a counsel to secure his services, or rather, as it has been said, to prevent the opposite side from engaging them. A retainer is either special or general. A special retainer is for a particular case which is expected to come on. A general retainer is given by a party desirous of securing a priority of claims on the counsel's services for any case which he may have in any court which that counsel attends. Called also Retaining Fee. (b) An authority given to an attorney or solicitor to proceed in an action. (c) The withholding what one has in his hands by virtue of some right.—4. The act of keeping dependants, or being in dependence. Bacon.

Retaining (rê-tân'ing), p. and a. Keeping in possession; serving to retain; keeping; back; engaging.—Retaining fee, a retainer. See RETAINER, 3.—Retaining wall, a wall that is built to retain a bank of earth from slipping down; a revetment. Called also Retain-wall.

Retainment (rê-tân'ment), n. The act of retaining; retention.

Retain-wall (rê-tân'wâl), n. See under RETAINING.

Retake (rê-tâk'), v. t. pret. retook; pp. retaken; ppr. retaking. 1. To take again.

A day should be appointed, when the remembrance should be retaken into consideration. Clarendon.

2. To take from a captor; to recapture; as, to retake a ship or prisoners.

Retaker (rê-tâk'êr), n. One who takes again what has been taken; a recaptor.

Retaliate (rê-tâl'i-ât), v. t. pret. & pp. retaliated; ppr. retaliating. [L. retatio, retaliatum, to retaliate—re, in return, and notio, like for like, talion, retaliation, from talis, such.] 1. To return the like for; to repay or requite by an act of the same kind as has been received. It is now seldom or never used except in a bad sense, that is, to return evil for evil; as, to retaliate injuries. 'His visit should be retaliated.' Sir T. Herbert. 'Hate with hate again retaliates.' Donne. 'That the kindness he has graciously shown them may be retaliated.' Dryden.

It is unlucky to be obliged to retaliate the injuries of authors, whose works are so soon forgotten that we are in danger of appearing the first aggressors. Swift.

Retaliate (rê-tâl'i-ât), v. i. To return like for like; as, to retaliate upon an enemy.

Our captain would not salute the city, except they would retaliate. Henry Tasso.

Retaliation (rê-tâl'i-ât'shon), n. The act of retaliating; the return of like for like; the doing that to another which he has done to us; requital of evil; reprisal; revenge. 'The lex talionis, or law of retaliation.' Blackstone.

They thought it no irreligion to prosecute the severest retaliation or revenge. Southey.

Formerly it was used also in a good sense, return of good for good. See the verb.

God takes what is done to others as done to himself, and by promise obliges himself to full retaliation. Calamy.

SYN. Requital, reprisal, revenge, repayment, retribution, punishment.

Retaliative (rê-tâl'i-ât-iv), a. Tending to retaliate; returning like for like; retaliatory; vindictive; revengeful. Quart. Rev.

Retaliatory (rê-tâl'i-ât-to-ri), a. Implying retaliation; retaliative; returning like for like; as, retaliatory measures; retaliatory edicts. Canning.

Retard (rê-târd'), v. t. [Fr. retarder; L. retardo—re, and tardo, to delay, from tardus, slow.] 1. To obstruct in swiftness of course; to keep delaying; to impede; to clog; to hinder; as, to retard the march of an army; to retard the motion of a ship.—Retarded motion, in physics, that which suffers continual diminution of velocity, as the motion of a body projected upwards. If the diminutions of velocity are equal in equal times the motion is said to be uniformly retarded. The laws of retarded motion are the same as those of accelerated motion, only the order is reversed. See under ACCELERATE.

They (metaphysics) were carried still farther, and corrupted all real knowledge, as well as retarded the progress of it. Bolingbroke.

2. To defer; to put off; to render more late; as, to retard the attacks of old age; to retard a rupture between nations. 'To retard a melancholy visit to a person one cannot relieve.' Pope.—SYN. To impede, binder, obstruct, detain, delay, procrastinate, defer.

Retard (rê-târd'), v. i. To stay back. Sir T. Browne.

Retard (rê-târd'), n. Retardation; used chiefly in the phrase retard of the tide, that in, the interval between the transit of the moon at which a tide originates and the appearance of the tide itself.

Retardation (ré-tár-dá'shon), n. 1. The act of retarding or abating velocity of motion, hindrance; the act of delaying; putting off or rendering more late; as, the retardation of the motion of a ship.

Out of this a man may derive the means of altering the colour of birds, and the retardation of hoary hairs. Bacon.

2. In physics, the act of hindering the free progress or velocity of a body, and ultimately therefore stopping it. It arises from the opposition of the medium in which the body moves, or from the friction of the surface upon which it moves (see FRICTION, RESISTANCE), or from the action of gravity. — Retardation of mean solar time, the change of the mean sun's right ascension in a sidereal day, by which he appears to hang back, as it were, in his diurnal revolution. — Retardation of the tides. See under ACCELERATION.

3. That which retards; a hindrance; an obstruction. 'Steep hills, sloughs, and other terrestrial retardations.' Sir W. Scott. — 4. In music, slackening or retarding the time, also, in harmony, suspension; the prolonging some note of a previous chord into the succeeding one in such a manner that it becomes a discord which is resolved upwards.

Retardative (ré-tár-dá-tív), a. Tending to retard, having power to retard.

Retarder (ré-tár-dér), n. One that retards, hinders, or delays. 'No inconsiderable retarder.' Glanville.

Retardment (ré-tár-d'ment), n. The act of retarding or delaying. Cowley.

Retch (rech), v. i. [A. Sax. Arcean, to retch, to hawk; allied to Arce, the throat, a cough; D. raekelen, to hawk and spit; Ice. Arceja, to hawk, to spit, Araki, spittle.] To make an effort to vomit; to strain, as in vomiting.

Beloved Julia, bear me still beseeching!
Here he grew inarticulate with retching. Byron.

[Byron would therefore seem to have pronounced the word rech.]

Retch (rech), v. t. and i. [Weakened form of reck.] To reck; to heed; to care for. Romance of the Rose.

Reckless (rech'les), a. [An old weakened form of reckless (which see).] Reckless; careless.

This said, he flung his reckless arms abroad,
And grovelling flat upon the ground he lay. Mir for Mags.

Recklessly (rech'les-li), adv. Recklessly. Drayton.

Recklessness (rech'les-nes), n. Recklessness; carelessness. 'Thus, well they may upbraid our recklessness.' Daniel.

Rece (ré'se), n. [L. a net.] In anat. a vascular net-work or plexus of vessels. — Rece mirabile, a net-work of blood-vessels in the basis of the brain. — Rece mucosum, in anat. a tissue lying between the epidermis or scarf-skin and the cutis vera or true skin. It is the seat of the colour of the skin, and contains black pigment in the negro.

Recessious (ré-sé'sh-us), a. Resembling network. [Rare.]

Recession (ré-sé'shon), n. [From L. re-tego, retectum, to uncover — re, back, and tego, to cover.] The act of disclosing or producing to view something concealed.

This is rather a reversion of a body to its own colour, or a reversion of its native colour, than a change. Boyle.

Retell (ré-tel'), v. t. To tell again.

Retent (ré-tent'), a. That which is retained. Retention (ré-tén'shon), n. [Fr. retention, from L. retentio, retentio, from retinere, retinere, to retain.] 1. The act of retaining or keeping; the state of being retained. 'A froward retention of custom.' Bacon. 2. The power of retaining, especially, the faculty of the mind by which it retains ideas; memory. 'No woman's heart so big to hold so much, they lack retention.' Shak.

The next chapter [of Locke's second Essay] treats of retention, in the same as memory, and which we see, at once, can only occupy itself with ideas already in the mind. J. D. Merritt.

Hence 3. That which preserves impressions, as a tablet. 'That poor retention could not so much hold.' Shak. [Rare.] — 4. In med. (a) the power of retaining, as in the stomach or bladder. (b) A morbid accumulation of solid or liquid matter in vessels of the body or cavities intended to contain it only for a time. — 5. The act of withholding; reserve, restraint.

His life I gave him, and did thereto add
My love without retention or restraint. Shak.

6. The state of being confined; custody; confinement.

To send the old and miserable king
To some retention and appointed guard. Shak.

7. In Scots law, a lien; the right of withholding a debt or retaining property until a debt due to the person claiming this right be duly paid.

Retentis (ré-tent'is), [L. ablative pl. of retentus, pp. of retinere, to hold back. See RETAIN.] Things retained. To be kept in retentis, to be kept among things retained or reserved for some future purpose. — To lie in retentis, in Scots law, to lie in proof, as the examinations of witnesses, which, in certain cases, are taken before the case is ripe for trial.

Retentive (ré-tent'iv), a. [Fr. retentif. See RETAIN.] Having the power to retain; as, a retentive memory, the retentive faculty; the retentive force of the stomach; a body retentive of heat or moisture.

Not alessen dungeon, nor strong links of iron,
Can be retentive to the strength of spirit. Shak.

Retentive (ré-tent'iv), n. That which retains or confines; restraint.

Secret checks readily given with outward retentive. Sp. Hall.

Retentively (ré-tent'iv-li), adv. In a retentive manner.

Retentiveness (ré-tent'iv-nes), n. The quality of being retentive; as, retentiveness of memory.

Retenue, n. Retinue. — At his retenue, retained by him. Chaucer.

Retepora (ré-té-po-ra), n. [L. rete, a net, and porus, a pore.] A genus of zoophytes of the class Polyzoa, the cells of which are immersed in a flattened foliaceous expansion pierced like network. The typical species (R. cellulosa), found in the Indian and Mediterranean Seas, is known by the name of Retepora cellulosa.

Neptune's ruffles. Fossil species occur in all formations.

Retepore (ré-té-pór), n. One of the Retepora.

Retext (ré-ték's), v. t. [L. retexo, to unweave.] To unweave; to disentangle. Sp. Hackel.

Retexture (ré-ték'túr), n. The act of weaving again, a second or new texture. 'Retexture of spiritual tissues.' Carlyle.

Rethor, n. [Gr. rhétor.] An orator or rhetorician. Chaucer.

Retiaris (ré-ti-á-ri-s), n. pl. [L. from rete, a net.] The name given to those spiders which spin a web to entrap their prey.

Retiarius (ré-ti-á-ri-us), n. [L. from rete, a net.] In Rom. antiq. a gladiator who wore only a short tunic and carried a trident and net. With these implements he endeavoured to entangle and despatch his adversary, who was armed with a helmet, a shield, and sword.

Retiary (ré-shi-á-ri), n. 1. Netlike. 'Retiary or hanging textures.' Sir T. Browne. 2. Net-making, constructing or using a net or web to catch prey. 'Retiary spiders.' Sir T. Browne — 3. Armed with a net, hence, skillful to entangle. 'Scholastic retiary versatility of logic.' Coleridge.

Retiary (ré-shi-á-ri), n. 1. A gladiator. See RETIARIUS. — 2. In zool. a spider which spins a web to catch its prey. See RETIARIUS.

Retice (ré-ti-sen), n. [Fr. retice, from L. reticula, from reticere, to be silent again — re, again, and ticere, to be silent.] 1. The quality of being reticent or of observing studied and continued silence, a refraining from talking; the keeping of one's counsel. 'A reticence or keeping silence.' Holland.

Such a man must have reticence in him, if he walk wearing his heart upon his sleeve. Carlyle.

2. In rhet. apologetics (which see).

Retice (ré-ti-sen), n. Retice.

Reticent (ré-ti-sent), a. [L. reticens, reticens, ppr. of reticere. See RETICENCE.] Having a disposition to be silent; reserved; not apt to speak about or reveal any matters; as, he is very reticent about his affairs.

Upon this he is naturally reticent. Lamb.

Reticle (ré-ti-kli), n. [L. reticulum, dim. of rete, a net.] 1. A small net. — 2. A reticule; a hand-bag. [Rare.] — 3. Same as reticula. 2. Reticular (ré-tik'ú-lér), a. [See above.] Having the form of a net or of net-work, formed with interstices, as, a reticular body or membrane. — The reticular body, or rete mucosum. See RETE. — Reticular membrane, substance, or tissue. Same as Cellular Membrane or Tissue. See CELLULAR.

Reticularia (ré-tik'ú-lér-i-a), n. pl. Same as Reticulosa.

Reticularly (ré-tik'ú-lér-li), adv. In a reticular manner. 'The outer surface of the chorion is reticularly ridged.' Owen.

Reticulate, Reticulated (ré-tik'ú-lát, ré-tik'ú-lát-ed), a. [L. reticulatus, from reticulum, dim. of rete, a net.] Netted; resembling net-work; having distinct lines crossing each other like net-work; in bot. and Reticulated Moulding.

zool. having distinct lines or veins crossing like net-work; as, a reticulated leaf; in mineral applied to minerals occurring in parallel fibres, crossed by other fibres which are also parallel, so as to exhibit meshes like those of a net. — Reticulated glass, a kind of ornamental glassware in which a network of air-bubbles is inclosed in the glass and arranged in regular interlacing series. — Reticulated micrometer. See RETICULE, 2. MICROMETER. — Reticulated moulding, in arch. a member composed of a fillet interlaced in various ways like net-work. It is seen chiefly in buildings in the Norman style. — Reticulated work, that variety of masonry wherein the stones are square and laid lozenge-wise, resembling the meshes of a net. This species of masonry was very common among the ancients.

Reticulated Work—Roman.

Reticulation (ré-tik'ú-lá'shon), n. 1. The state of being reticulated or netlike; that which is reticulated; net-work, organization of substances resembling a net.

Your account of the particular net you occupy in the great reticulation is not very consolatory. Carlyle.

2. A method of copying a painting or drawing by the help of threads stretched across a frame so as to form squares, an equal number of proportional squares being made on the canvas or paper on which the copy is to be made.

Reticula (ré-ti-kúli), n. [Fr. reticula, L. reticulum, dim. of rete, a net.] 1. A kind of bag, formerly of net-work, but now of every description of materials, used by ladies for carrying in the hand. 2. An attachment to a telescope, used for measuring small celestial distances. It consists of an eye-piece of low power, having a net-work of some fine fibres crossing each other at right angles, and dividing the field of view into a series of small equal squares; a reticulated micrometer — 3. Same as Reticulum, 1.

Reticulosa (ré-tik'ú-lá-sa), n. pl. A term employed by Dr. Carpenter to designate those Protozoa, such as the Foraminifera, in which the pseudopodia run into one another and form a net-work.

Reticulum (ré-tik'ú-lum), n. [L. a little net.] 1. The honey-comb bag, or second cavity of the complex stomach of the ruminant quadrupeds. — 2. In bot. the fibrous debris at the base of the petioles of some palms.

the parts naturally the undermost become the uppermost, and vice versa; as, a resupinate corolla; a resupinate leaf.

Resupinated (rě-sū'pī-nāt-ed), a. Resupinate.

Resupination (rě-sū'pī-nā'shon), n. [See above.] The state of lying on the back; the state of being resupinate or reversed. 'A resupination of the figure.' Wotton.

Resupine (rě-sū'pīn), a. Lying on the back. He spake, and downward swayed, fell resupine, With his huge neck aslant. Compter.

Resupply (rě-sūp-plī), v.t. To supply again. Southey.

Resurgence (rě-sēr'jens), n. The act of rising again; resurrection. Coleridge.

Resurgent (rě-sēr'jent), a. [L. resurgens, resurgens, ppr. resurgo—re, again, and surgo, to rise.] Rising again or from the dead. Ridgway.

Resurgent (rě-sēr'jent), n. One who or that which rises again; especially, one who rises from the dead. Sydney Smith.

Resurprise (rě-sēr'prīz), n. A second or fresh surprise.

The process of this action drew on a resurprise of the castle by the Thebans. Bacon.

Resurprise (rě-sēr'prīz), v.t. To surprise again; to retake unawares.

Resurrect (rě-zēr-řekt'), v.t. [See RESURRECTION.] 1. To take from the grave, as a dead body. [Low.]—2. To restore to life; to reanimate; to bring to public view that which had been lost or forgotten.

Resurrection (rě-zēr-řek'shon), n. [Fr., from L. resurrectio, from L. resurgere, resurrectum—re, again, and surgo, to arise.] 1. A rising again; a springing again into life; a revival, as from a state of ignorance or degradation; as, the resurrection of hopes; a moral resurrection; specifically, a rising from the dead; the revival of the dead of the human race, or their return from the grave, particularly at the general judgment. 'A glorious and joyful resurrection.' Addison.

And have hope toward God . . . that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust. Acts xxiv. 15.

2. The state of being risen from the dead; the future state.

In the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage. Mat. xxiii. 30.

Resurrectionist (rě-zēr-řek'shon-ist), n. One whose business it is to steal bodies from the grave for dissection.

Resurrectionize (rě-zēr-řek'shon-īz), v.t. To raise from the dead; to resurrect. Southey.

Resurrection-man (rě-zēr-řek'shon-man), n. Same as Resurrectionist. Dickens.

Resurvey (rě-sēr-vā'), v.t. 1. To survey again or anew; to review.—2. To read and examine again.

Once more resurvey These poor rude lines of thy deceased lover. Shak.

Resurvey (rě-sēr-vā'), n. A new survey.

Resurveyable (rě-sūf'ī-tā-bl), a. Capable of being resurveyed or restored to life.

Resuscitant (rě-sūf'ī-tant), a. and n. Resuscitating; one who or that which resuscitates.

Resuscitate (rě-sūf'ī-tāt), v.t. pret. & pp. resuscitated, ppr. resuscitating. [L. resuscito, resuscitatus—re, again, and suscito, to rouse up—sus, sub, and cito, to put into quick motion, to incite, to stimulate, a freq. from cio, to summon, to make to go.] To stir up anew; to revivify; to revive; particularly, to recover from apparent death; as, to resuscitate a drowned person; to resuscitate withered plants. 'After death we should be resuscitated.' Glanville.

It is difficult to resuscitate surprise when familiarity has once laid the sentiment asleep. Paley.

No wind has resuscitated the face of the sleeping waters. Lamb.

Resuscitate (rě-sūf'ī-tāt), v.i. To revive; to come to life again.

As these projects, however often slain, always resuscitate, it is not superfluous to examine one or two of the fallacies by which the schemers impose on themselves. J. S. Mill.

Resuscitation (rě-sūf'ī-tā'shon), n. The act of resuscitating, or the state of being resuscitated; revival; revivification; restoration to life; the restoring to animation of persons apparently dead, as in cases of drowning, suspended animation from exposure to cold, or from disease. 'The extinction and resuscitation of arts.' Johnson.

The resuscitation of the body from its dust is a supernatural work. Ep. Hall.

Resuscitative (rě-sūf'ī-tāt-iv), a. Tending to resuscitate; revivifying; raising from apparent death; reproducing.

Resuscitator (rě-sūf'ī-tāt-ēr), n. One who resuscitates.

Ret (ret), v.t. [D. reten, to ret flax; allied to rot.] To steep or macerate flax in water, after it is taken from the field, in order to separate the fibre by incipient rotting.

Retable (rě-tā'bl), n. In arch. a shelf or ledge behind an altar for holding candles or vases. Sometimes called Super-altar.

Retail (rě-tāl'), v.t. [Fr. retailer, to cut again, to cut often, retail, a piece cut off—re, again, and tailer, to cut, from L.L. talearia, a tally, from L. talear, a stick, a bar (hence also détail, taylor, tally).] Retail is thus to sell by pieces cut off. 1. To sell in small quantities or parcels; opposed to selling by wholesale; as, to retail cloth or groceries.

The keepers of ale-houses pay for a licence to retail ale and spirituous liquors. Adam Smith.

The sage dame, experienced in her trade, By names of toasts, retails each batter'd jade. Byss.

3. To deal out in small quantities; to tell in broken parts; to tell to many; to tell again; to hand down by report; as, to retail slander or idle reports.

Metaphors the truth should live from age to age, As 'twere retail'd to all posterity. Shak.

Retail (rě-tāl'), n. The sale of commodities in small quantities or parcels, or at second hand; a dealing out in small portions. 'These and most other things which are sold by retail.' Adam Smith.

Retail (rě-tāl'), a. Applied to the sale of anything in small quantities or parcels; as, a retail trade. Sydney Smith.

Retailer (rě-tāl'ēr), n. One who retails; one who deals out in small quantities.

The profits of the farmer, of the manufacturer, of the merchant and retailer, are all drawn from the price of the goods which the two first produce, and the two last buy and sell. Adam Smith.

Retainment (rě-tān'ment), n. Act of retaining.

Retain (rě-tān'), v.t. [Fr. retenir, L. retinere—re, back, and teneo, to hold.] 1. To hold or keep in possession; to keep from departure or escape; to hold; to detain; to keep; not to lose or part with or dismiss; as, the memory retains ideas which facts or arguments have suggested to the mind. 'Whom I would have retained with me.' Phil. xiii. 13.

They did not like to retain God in their knowledge. Rom. i. 28.

An executor may retain a debt due to him from the testator. Blackstone.

Still Hebron's honour'd, happy soil retains Our royal hero's beautiful, dear remains. Dryden.

2. To keep in pay; to hire; to engage by the payment of a preliminary fee; as, to retain counsel.

A Benedictine convent has now retained the most learned father of their order to write in its defence. Addison.

3. To withhold; to restrain; to keep back.

He laid him bleeding on the ground, and had killed him if his brother Robert had not retained him, and made him sensible how much more it concerned him to make his escape than pursue his revenge. Sir H. Temple.

Retain (rě-tān'), v.t. 1. To belong to; to depend on; to pertain. 'A somewhat languid reliish retaining to bitterness.' Boyle.

2. To keep; to continue.

No more can impure man retain and move In the pure region of that worthy love. Donne.

Retainable (rě-tān'a-bl), a. Capable of being retained.

Retainal (rě-tān'al), n. The act of retaining. Annual Review. [Rare.]

Retainer-ship (rě-tān'ēr-ship), n. The state of being a retainer or dependant.

It was the policy of these kings to make them all (clergy and nobility) of their own livery or retainer-ship. N. Bacon.

Retainer (rě-tān'ēr), n. 1. One who or that which retains. 'One that has forgot the common meaning of words, but an admirable retainer of the sound.' Swift.—2. One who is kept in service; an attendant; a dependant; in a specific sense, a servant, not a domestic, but occasionally attending and wearing his master's livery; as, the retainers of the ancient princes and nobility.

In common law, retainer signifieth a servant not menial nor familiar, that is, not dwelling in his house; but only using or bearing his name and livery. Conwell.

Still less would the vast body of tenants and their retainers, who were fed at the castle in time of peace, refuse to carry their pikes and staves into the field of battle. Haliam.

3. In law, (a) a preliminary fee given to a counsel to secure his services, or rather, as it has been said, to prevent the opposite side from engaging them. A retainer is either special or general. A special retainer is for a particular case which is expected to come on. A general retainer is given by a party desirous of securing a priority of claim on the counsel's services for any case which he may have in any court which that counsel attends. Called also Retaining Fee. 'An authority given to an attorney or solicitor to proceed in an action. (c) The withdrawal of what one has in his hands by virtue of some right.—4. The act of keeping dependants, or being in dependence. Bacon.

Retaining (rě-tān'ing), p. and a. Keeping in possession; serving to retain; keeping back; engaging.—Retaining fee, a retainer. See RETAINER, 3.—Retaining wall, a wall that is built to retain a bank of earth from slipping down; a revetment. Called also Retain-wall.

Retainment (rě-tān'ment), n. The act of retaining; retention.

Retain-wall (rě-tān'wāl), n. See under RETAINING.

Retake (rě-tāk'), v.t. pret. retook; pp. retaken; ppr. retaking. 1. To take again.

A day should be appointed, when the remonstrances should be retaken into consideration. Clarendon.

2. To take from a captor; to recapture; as, to retake a ship or prisoners.

Retaker (rě-tāk'ēr), n. One who takes again what has been taken; a recaptor.

Retaliate (rě-tāl'ī-āt), v.t. pret. & pp. retaliated; ppr. retaliating. [L. retalis, retaliatum, to retaliate—re, in return, and noctis, like for like, tallion, retaliation, from talis, such.] To return the like for; to repay or requite by an act of the same kind as has been received. It is now seldom or never used except in a bad sense, that is, to return evil for evil; as, to retaliate injuries. 'His visit should be retaliated.' Sir T. Herbert. 'Hate with hate again retaliates.' Donne. 'That the kindness he has graciously shown them may be retaliated.' Dryden.

It is unlikely to be obliged to retaliate the injuries of authors, whose works are so soon forgotten that we are in danger of appearing the first aggressors. Swift.

Retaliate (rě-tāl'ī-āt), v.i. To return like for like; as, to retaliate upon an enemy.

Our captain would not salute the chy, except they would retaliate. Henry Tounge.

Retaliation (rě-tāl'ī-āt'shon), n. The act of retaliating; the return of like for like; the doing that to another which he has done to us; requital of evil; reprisal; revenge. 'The lex talionis, or law of retaliation.' Blackstone.

They thought it no irreligion to prosecute the severest retaliation or revenge. Smith.

Formerly it was used also in a good sense, return of good for good. See the verb.

God takes what is done to others as done to himself, and by promise obliges himself to full retaliation. Calamy.

SYN. Requital, reprisal, revenge, repayment, retribution, punishment.

Retaliative (rě-tāl'ī-āt-iv), a. Tending to retaliate; returning like for like; retaliatory; vindictive; revengeful. Quart. Rev.

Retaliatory (rě-tāl'ī-āt-ō-ri), a. Implying retaliation; retaliative; returning like for like; as, retaliatory measures; retaliatory edicts. Canning.

Retard (rě-tārd'), v.t. [Fr. retarder; L. retardo—re, and tardo, to delay, from tardus, slow.] 1. To obstruct in swiftness of course; to keep delaying; to impede; to clog; to hinder; as, to retard the march of an army; to retard the motion of a ship.—Retarded motion, in physics, that which suffers continual diminution of velocity, as the motion of a body projected upwards. If the diminutions of velocity are equal in equal times the motion is said to be uniformly retarded. The laws of retarded motion are the same as those of accelerated motion, only the order is reversed. See under ACCELERATE.

They (metaphysics) were carried still farther, and corrupted all real knowledge, as well as retarded the progress of it. Bolingbroke.

2. To defer; to put off; to render more late; as, to retard the attacks of old age; to retard a rupture between nations. 'To retard a melancholy visit to a person one cannot relieve.' Pope.—SYN. To impede, hinder, obstruct, detain, delay, procrastinate, defer.

Retard (rě-tārd'), v.i. To stay back. St. Brounne.

Retard (rě-tārd'), n. Retardation; used chiefly in the phrase retard of the tide, that in the interval between the transit of the moon at which a tide originates and the appearance of the tide itself.

Retardation (ré-tár-dá'shon), n. 1. The act of retarding or abating velocity of motion; hindrance; the act of delaying; putting off or rendering more late; as, the retardation of the motion of a ship.

Out of this a man may derive the means of altering the colour of birds, and the retardation of hoary hairs.

2. In physics, the act of hindering the free progress or velocity of a body, and ultimately therefore stopping it. It arises from the opposition of the medium in which the body moves, or from the friction of the surface upon which it moves (see FRICTION, RESISTANCE), or from the action of gravity.—Retardation of mean solar time, the change of the mean sun's right ascension in a sidereal day, by which he appears to hang back, as it were, in his diurnal revolution.—Retardation of the tides. See under ACCELERATION.

3. That which retards; a hindrance, an obstruction. 'Steep hills, sloughs, and other terrestrial retardations.' Sir W. Scott.—4. In music, slackening or retarding the time; also, in harmony, suspension; the prolonging some note of a previous chord into the succeeding one in such a manner that it becomes a discord which is resolved upwards.

Retardative (ré-tár-dá-tív), a. Tending to retard, having power to retard.

Retarder (ré-tár-dér), n. One that retards, hinders, or delays. 'No inconsiderable retarder.' Glanville.

Retardment (ré-tár-d'ment), n. The act of retarding or delaying. Cowley.

Retch (réch), v. i. (A. Sax. reowan, to retch, to hawk, allied to Araca, the throat, a cough, D. roekelen, to hawk and spit; Icei. kronja, to hawk, to spit, Arak, spittle.) To make an effort to vomit; to strain, as in vomiting.

Beloved Julia, bear me still beseeching!
Here he grew harkening with retching. Byron.

(Byron would therefore seem to have pronounced the word retch.)

Retch (réch), v. t. and i. (Weakened form of reck.) To rock; to heed; to care for. Reckonment of the Rose.

Retchless (réch'les), a. [An old weakened form of reckless (which see).] Reckless; careless.

This said, he flung his retchless arms abroad,
And groveling flat upon the ground he lay.

My for Stage.

Retchlessly (réch'les-ly), adv. Recklessly.

Retchlessness (réch'les-ness), n. Recklessness; carelessness. 'Thus, well they may upbraid our retchlessness.' Daniel.

Reve (révé), n. [L., a net.] In anat. a vascular net-work or plexus of vessels.—Reve mirabilia, a net-work of blood-vessels in the basis of the brain.—Reve muscunum, in anat. a tissue lying between the epidermis or scarf-skin and the cutis vera or true skin. It is the seat of the colour of the skin, and contains black pigment in the negro.

Retaceous (ré-tá'sus), a. Resembling network. [Rare.]

Retaction (ré-ték'shon), n. (From L. re-ago, retractum, to uncover—re, back, and ago, to cover.) The act of disclosing or producing to view something concealed.

This is rather a retraction of a body to its own colour, or a retraction of its active colour, than a change. Boyle.

Retell (ré-tél'), v. t. To tell again.

Retent (ré-tén'), n. That which is retained.

Retention (ré-tén'shon), n. [Fr. retention, from L. retentio, retentio, from retinere, retinere. See RETAIN.] 1. The act of retaining or keeping; the state of being retained. 'A froward retention of custom.' Bacon. 2. The power of retaining, especially, the faculty of the mind by which it retains ideas, memory. 'No woman's heart so big to hold so much; they lack retention.' Shak.

The next chapter [of Locke's second Essay] treats of retention, which is the same as memory, and which we see, at once, can only occupy itself with ideas already in the mind. J. D. Morril.

Hence—3. That which preserves impressions, as a tablet. 'That poor retention could not so much hold.' Shak. [Rare.]—4. In med. (a) the power of retaining, as in the stomach or bladder. (b) A morbid accumulation of solid or liquid matter in vessels of the body or cavities intended to contain it only for a time.—5. The act of withholding; reserve; restraint.

His life I gave him, and did thereto add
My love without retention or restraint. Shak.

6. The state of being confined; custody; confinement.

To send the old and miserable king
To some retention and appointed guard. Shak.

7. In Scots law, a lien; the right of withholding a debt or retaining property until a debt due to the person claiming this right be duly paid.

Retentis (ré-tén'tis), [L., ablative pl. of retentus, pp. of retinere, to hold back. See RETAIN.] Things retained. To be kept in retentis, to be kept among things retained or reserved for some future purpose.—To lie in retentis, in Scots law, to lie in proof, as the examinations of witnesses, which, in certain cases, are taken before the case is ripe for trial.

Retentive (ré-tén'tiv), a. [Fr. retentif. See RETAIN.] Having the power to retain; as, a retentive memory; the retentive faculty; the retentive force of the stomach; a body retentive of heat or moisture.

Not alicius dungeon, nor strong links of iron,
Can be retentive to the strength of spirit. Shak.

Retentive (ré-tén'tiv), n. That which retains or confines, restraint.

Secret checks readily comply with outward restraint.

Retentively (ré-tén'tiv-ly), adv. In a retentive manner.

Retentiveness (ré-tén'tiv-ness), n. The quality of being retentive; as, retentiveness of memory.

Retenus, n. Retinua.—At his retenus, retained by him. Chaucer.

Retepora (ré-té-po-ra), n. [L. rete, a net, and porus, a pore.] A genus of zoophytes of the class Polyzoa, the cells of which are immersed in a flattened foliaceous expansion pierced like network. The typical species (R. cellulosa), found in the Indian and Mediterranean Seas, is known by the name of Retepora cellulosa.

Neptune's ruffles. Fossil species occur in all formations.

Retepora (ré-té-pór), n. One of the Retepora.

Retext (ré-ték'), v. t. [L. retexo, to unweave.] To unweave, to disentangle. Bp. Hecker.

Retice (ré-tis), n. [Fr. retice, from L. reticula, from reticere, to be silent again—re, again, and ticere, to be silent.] 1. The quality of being reticent or of observing studied and continued silence, a refraining from talking, the keeping of one's counsel. 'A retice or keeping silence.' Holland. Such a man must have reticence in him, if he walk wearing his heart upon his sleeve. Carlyle.

2. In rhet. aposiopesis (which see).

Reticence (ré-tis-én), n. Retice.

Reticent (ré-tis-én), a. [L. reticens, reticens, ppr. of reticere. See RETICENCE.] Having a disposition to be silent, reserved, not apt to speak about or reveal any matters; as, he is very reticent about his affairs.

Upon this he is naturally reticent. Lamb.

Reticle (ré-tí-kl), n. [L. reticulus, dim. of rete, a net.] 1. A small net.—2. A reticula, a hand-bag. [Rare.]—3. Same as reticula. 2. Reticular (ré-tík'ú-lér), a. [See above.] Having the form of a net or of net-work; furnished with interstices; as, a reticular body or membrane.—The reticular body, or rete musculosum. See RETE.—Reticular membrane, substance, or tissue. Same as Cellular Membrane or Tissue. See CELLULAR.

Reticularia (ré-tík'ú-lá-ri-a), n. pl. Same as Reticulosa.

Reticularly (ré-tík'ú-lér-ly), adv. In a reticular manner. 'The outer surface of the chorion is reticularly ridged.' Owen.

Reticulate, Reticulated (ré-tík'ú-lát, ré-tík'ú-lát-ed), a. [L. reticulatus, from reticulum, dim. of rete, a net.] Netted; resembling net-work; having distinct lines crossing each other like net-work; in bot. and parallel fibres, crossed by other fibres which are also parallel, so as to exhibit meshes like those of a net.—Reticulated glass, a kind of ornamental glassware in which a network of air-bubbles is inclosed in the glass and arranged in regular interlacing series.—Reticulated micrometer. See RETICULE, 2. MICROMETER.—Reticulated moulding, in arch. a member composed of a fillet interlaced in various ways like net-work. It is seen chiefly in buildings in the Norman style.—Reticulated work, that variety of masonry wherein the stones are square and laid lozenge-wise, resembling the meshes of a net. This species of masonry was very common among the ancients.

Reticulated Work—Roman.

Reticulation (ré-tík'ú-lá'shon), n. 1. The state of being reticulated or netlike; that which is reticulated; net-work, organization of substances resembling a net.

Your account of the particular net you occupy in the great reticulation is not very consolatory. Carlyle.

2. A method of copying a painting or drawing by the help of threads stretched across a frame so as to form squares, an equal number of proportional squares being made on the canvas or paper on which the copy is to be made.

Reticule (ré-tí-kú), n. [Fr. reticula, L. reticulum, dim. of rete, a net.] 1. A kind of bag, formerly of net-work, but now of every description of materials, used by ladies for carrying in the hand.—2. An attachment to a telescope, used for measuring small celestial distances. It consists of an eye-piece of low power, having a net-work of some fine fibres crossing each other at right angles, and dividing the field of view into a series of small equal squares, a reticulated micrometer.—3. Same as Reticulum, 1.

Reticulosa (ré-tík'ú-lá-sa), n. pl. A term employed by Dr Carpenter to designate those Protozoa, such as the Foraminifera, in which the pseudopodia run into one another and form a net-work.

Resuscitant (rě-sū-sī-tānt), a. and n. Resuscitating; one who or that which resuscitates.

Resuscitate (rě-sū-sī-tāt), v.t. pret. & pp. resuscitated; ppr. resuscitating. [L. resuscito, resuscitatum—re, again, and suscito, to rouse up—sus, sub, and cito, to put into quick motion, to incite, to stimulate, a freq. from cio, to summon, to make to go.] 1. To stir up anew; to revive; to revive; particularly, to recover from apparent death; as, to resuscitate a drowned person; to resuscitate withered plants. 'After death we should be resuscitated.' Glanville.

It is difficult to resuscitate surprise when familiarity has once laid the sentiment asleep. Paley.

No wind has resuscitated the face of the sleeping waters. Lamb.

Resuscitate (rě-sū-sī-tāt), v.i. To revive; to come to life again.

As these projects, however often slain, always resuscitate, it is not superfluous to examine one or two of the fallacies by which the schemers impose on themselves. J. S. Mill.

Resuscitation (rě-sū-sī-tā'shon), n. The act of resuscitating, or the state of being resuscitated; revival; revivification; restoration to life; the restoring to animation of persons apparently dead, as in cases of drowning, suspended animation from exposure to cold, or from disease. 'The extinction and resuscitation of arts.' Johnson.

The resuscitation of the body from its dust is a supernatural work. Bp. Hall.

Resuscitative (rě-sū-sī-tāt-iv), a. Tending to resuscitate; reviving; revivifying; raising from apparent death; reproducing.

Resuscitator (rě-sū-sī-tāt-ēr), n. One who resuscitates.

Ret (ret), v.t. [D. reten, to ret flax; allied to rot.] To steep or macerate flax in water, after it is taken from the field, in order to separate the fibre by incipient rotting.

Retable (rě-tā'bl), n. In arch. a shelf or ledge behind an altar for holding candles or vases. Sometimes called Super-altar.

Retail (rě-tāl'), v.t. [Fr. retailer, to cut again, to cut often, retail, a piece cut off—re, again, and tailleur, to cut, from L.L. talca, talca, a tally, from L. talca, a stick, a bar (hence also detail, tailor, tally).] Retail is thus to sell by pieces cut off. 1. To sell in small quantities or parcels; opposed to selling by wholesale; as, to retail cloth or groceries.

The keepers of ale-houses pay for a licence to retail ale and spirituous liquors. Adam Smith.

2. To sell at second hand.

The sage dame, experienced in her trade, By names of toasts, retails each batter'd jade. Pope.

3. To deal out in small quantities; to tell in broken parts; to tell to many; to tell again; to hand down by report; as, to retail slander or idle reports.

Metinks the truth should live from age to age, As 'twere retail'd to all posterity. Shak.

Retail (rě-tāl), n. The sale of commodities in small quantities or parcels, or at second hand; a dealing out in small portions. 'These and most other things which are sold by retail.' Adam Smith.

Retail (rě-tāl'), a. Applied to the sale of anything in small quantities or parcels; as, a retail trade. Sydney Smith.

Retailer (rě-tāl'ēr), n. One who retails; one who deals out in small quantities.

The profits of the farmer, of the manufacturer, of the merchant and retailer, are all drawn from the price of the goods which the two first produce, and the two last buy and sell. Adam Smith.

Retainment (rě-tāl'ment), n. Act of retaining.

Retain (rě-tān'), v.t. [Fr. retenir, L. retineo—re, back, and teneo, to hold.] 1. To hold or keep in possession; to keep from departure or escape; to hold; to detain; to keep; not to lose or part with or dismiss; as, the memory retains ideas which facts or arguments have suggested to the mind. 'Whom I would have retained with me.' Phil. xiii. 13.

They did not like to retain God in their knowledge. Rom. i. 28.

An executor may retain a debt due to him from the testator. Blackstone.

Still Hebron's honour'd, happy soil retains Our royal hero's beauteous, dear remains. Dryden.

2. To keep in pay; to hire; to engage by the payment of a preliminary fee; as, to retain counsel.

A Benedictine convent has now retained the most learned father of their order to write in its defence. Addison.

3. To withhold; to restrain; to keep back.

He laid him bleeding on the ground, and had killed him if his brother Robert had not retained him, and made him sensible how much more it concerned him to make his escape than pursue his revenge. Sir W. Temple.

Retain (rě-tān'), v.i. 1. To belong to; to depend on; to pertain. 'A somewhat languid relish retaining to bitterness.' Boyle.

2. To keep; to continue.

No more can I retain and move In the pure region of that worthy love. Donne.

Retainable (rě-tān'ā-bl), a. Capable of being retained.

Retainal (rě-tān'al), n. The act of retaining.

Retainship (rě-tān'dēr-ship), n. The state of being a retainer or dependant.

It was the policy of these kings to make them all (clergy and nobility) of their own livery or retainer-ship. N. Bacon.

Retainer (rě-tān'ēr), n. 1. One who or that which retains. 'One that has forgot the common meaning of words, but an admirable retainer of the sound.' Swift.—2. One who is kept in service; an attendant; a dependant; in a specific sense, a servant, not a domestic, but occasionally attending and wearing his master's livery; as, the retainers of the ancient princes and nobility.

In common law, retainer signifieth a servant not menial nor familiar, that is, not dwelling in his house; but only using or bearing his name and livery. Cornell.

Still less would the vast body of tenants and their retainers, who were fed at the castle in time of peace, refuse to carry their pikes and staves into the field of battle. Italian.

3. In law, (a) a preliminary fee given to a counsel to secure his services, or rather, as it has been said, to prevent the opposite side from engaging them. A retainer is either special or general. A special retainer is for a particular case which is expected to come on. A general retainer is given by a party desirous of securing a priority of claim on the counsel's services for any case which he may have in any court which that counsel attends. Called also Retaining Fee. (b) An authority given to an attorney or solicitor to proceed in an action. (c) The withholding what one has in his hands by virtue of some right.—4. The act of keeping dependants, or being in dependence. Bacon.

Retaining (rě-tān'ing), p. and a. Keeping in possession; serving to retain; keeping back; engaging.—Retaining fee, a retainer. See RETAINER, 3.—Retaining wall, a wall that is built to retain a bank of earth from slipping down; a revetment. Called also Retain-wall.

Retainment (rě-tān'ment), n. The act of retaining; retention.

Retain-wall (rě-tān'wāl), n. See under RETAINING.

Retake (rě-tāk'), v.t. pret. retook; pp. retaken; ppr. retaking. 1. To take again.

A day should be appointed, when the remonstrance should be retaken into consideration. Clarendon.

2. To take from a captor; to recapture; as, to retake a ship or prisoners.

Retaker (rě-tāk'ēr), n. One who takes again what has been taken; a recaptor.

Retaliate (rě-tāl'iat), v.t. pret. & pp. retaliated; ppr. retaliating. [L. retalio, retaliatum, to retaliate—re, in return, and talio, like for like, talion, retaliation, from talio, such.] 1. To return the like for; to repay or requite by an act of the same kind as has been received. It is now seldom or never used except in a bad sense, that is, to return evil for evil; as, to retaliate injuries. 'His visit should be retaliated.' Sir T. Herbert. 'Hate with hate again retaliates.' Donne. 'That the kindness he has graciously shown them may be retaliated.' Dryden.

It is unlucky to be obliged to retaliate the injuries of authors, whose works are so soon forgotten that we are in danger of appearing the first aggressors. Swift.

Retaliate (rě-tāl'iat), v.i. To return like for like; as, to retaliate upon an enemy.

Our captain would not salute the city, except they would retaliate. Henry Tassie.

Retaliation (rě-tāl'iat'shon), n. The act of retaliating; the return of like for like; the doing that to another which he has done to us; requital of evil; reprisal; revenge. 'The lex talionis, or law of retaliation.' Blackstone.

They thought it no irreligion to prosecute the avengest retaliation or revenge. South.

Formerly it was used also in a good sense, return of good for good. See the verb.

God takes what is done to others as done to himself, and by promise obliges himself to full retaliation. Calamy.

SYN. Requital, reprisal, revenge, repayment, retribution, punishment.

Retaliative (rě-tāl'iat-iv), a. Tending to retaliate; returning like for like; retaliatory; vindictive; revengeful. Quart. Rev.

Retaliatory (rě-tāl'iat-to-ri), a. Implying retaliation; retaliative; returning like for like; as, retaliatory measures; retaliatory edicts. Canning.

Retard (rě-tārd'), v.t. [Fr. retarder; L. retardo—re, and tardo, to delay, from tardus, slow.] 1. To obstruct in swiftness of course; to keep delaying; to impede; to clog; to hinder; as, to retard the march of an army; to retard the motion of a ship.—Retarded motion, in physics, that which suffers continual diminution of velocity, as the motion of a body projected upwards. If the diminutions of velocity are equal in equal times the motion is said to be uniformly retarded. The laws of retarded motion are the same as those of accelerated motion, only the order is reversed. See under ACCELERATE.

They (metaphysics) were carried still farther, and corrupted all real knowledge, as well as retarded the progress of it. Beltinger.

2. To defer; to put off; to render more late; as, to retard the attacks of old age; to retard a rupture between nations. 'To retard a melancholy visit to a person one cannot relieve.' Pope.—SYN. To impede, hinder, obstruct, detain, delay, procrastinate, defer.

Retard (rě-tārd'), v.i. To stay back. Sir T. Browne.

Retard (rě-tārd'), n. Retardation; used chiefly in the phrase retard of the tide, that is, the interval between the transit of the moon at which a tide originates and the appearance of the tide itself.

Retardation (ré-tár-dá'shon), n. 1. The act of retarding or abating velocity of motion; hindrance; the act of delaying; putting off or rendering more late; as, the retardation of the motion of a ship.

Out of this a man may derive the means of altering the colour of birds, and the retardation of hoary hair. Bacon.

2. In physics, the act of hindering the free progress or velocity of a body, and ultimately therefore stopping it. It arises from the opposition of the medium in which the body moves, or from the friction of the surface upon which it moves (see FRICTION, RESISTANCE), or from the action of gravity. Retardation of mean solar time, the change of the mean sun's right ascension in a sidereal day, by which he appears to hang back, as it were, in his diurnal revolution.—Retardation of the tides. See under ACCELERATION.

3. That which retards, a hindrance, an obstruction. 'Steep hills, sloughs, and other terrestrial retardations.' Sir W. Scott. 4. In music, slackening or retarding the time, also, in harmony, suspension, the prolonging some note of a previous chord into the succeeding one in such a manner that it becomes a discord which is resolved upwards.

Retardative (ré-tár-dá-tív), a. Tending to retard, having power to retard.

Retarder (ré-tár-dér), n. One that retards, hinders, or delays. 'No inconsiderable retarder.' Glanville.

Retardment (ré-tár-d'ment), n. The act of retarding or delaying. Cowley.

Retch (rech), v. t. [A. Sax. Arsecan, to retch, to hawk; allied to Arca, the throat, a cough; D. rechen, to hawk and spit; Icei. Armska, to hawk, to spit, Arskit, spittle.] To make an effort to vomit, to strain, as in vomiting.

Beloved Julia, bear me still beseeching! Here he grew insatiable with retching. Byron.

[Byron would therefore seem to have pronounced the word rech.]

Retch (rech), v. t. and i. [Weakened form of reck.] To rack; to heed, to care for. Homage of the Rose.

Retchless (rech'les), a. [An old weakened form of reckless (which see).] Reckless; careless.

This said, he flung his retchless arms abroad, And groveling flat upon the ground he lay. Mir. for Mags.

Retchlessly (rech'les-ly), adv. Recklessly Drayton.

Retchlessness (rech'les-ness), n. Recklessness, carelessness. 'Thus, well they may upbraid our retchlessness.' Daniel.

Rete (ré-té), n. [L., a net.] In anat. a vascular net-work or plexus of vessels.—Rete mirabile, a net-work of blood-vessels in the base of the brain.—Rete mucosum, in anat. a tissue lying between the epidermis or scarf skin and the cutis vera or true skin. It is the seat of the colour of the skin, and contains black pigment in the negro.

Retelious (ré-té'us), a. Resembling net-work. [Rare.]

Retention (ré-ték'shon), n. [From L. re-teno, retentum, to uncover—re, back, and teno, to cover.] The act of disclosing or producing to view something concealed.

This is rather a retention of a body to its own colour, or a retention of its native colour, than a change. Boyle.

Retell (ré-tél'), v. t. To tell again.

Retent (ré-tent'), a. That which is retained.

Retention (ré-tén'shon), n. [Fr. retention, from L. retentio, retentio, from retineo, retentum. See RETAIN.] 1. The act of retaining or keeping; the state of being retained. 'A froward retention of custom.' Bacon. 2. The power of retaining, especially the faculty of the mind by which it retains ideas, memory. 'No woman's heart so big to hold so much, they lack retention.' Shak.

The next chapter [of Locke's second Essay] treats of retention [which is the same as memory, and which we see, at once, can only occupy itself with ideas already in the mind.] D. Mervin.

Hence—3. That which preserves impressions, as a tablet. 'That poor retention could not so much hold.' Shak. [Rare.]

4. In med. (a) the power of retaining, as in the stomach or bladder. (b) A morbid accumulation of solid or fluid matter in vessels of the body or cavities intended to contain it only for a time.—5. The act of withholding, reserve, restraint.

He left I gave him, and did thereto add My love without retention or restraint. Shak.

6. The state of being confined; custody; confinement.

To send the old and miserable king To some retention and appointed guard. Shak.

7. In Scots law, a lien; the right of withholding a debt or retaining property until a debt due to the person claiming this right be duly paid.

Retentia (ré-tent'ia), [L., ablative pl. of retentus, pp. of retineo, to hold back. See RETAIN.] Things retained. To be kept in retentia, to be kept among things retained or reserved for some future purpose.—To lie in retentia, in Scots law, to lie in proof, as the examinations of witnesses, which, in certain cases, are taken before the case is ripe for trial.

Retentive (ré-tent'iv), a. [Fr. retentif. See RETAIN.] Having the power to retain; as, a retentive memory; the retentive faculty; the retentive force of the stomach; a body retentive of heat or moisture.

Nor slight dungeon, nor strong links of iron, Can be retentive to the strength of spirit. Shak.

Retentive (ré-tent'iv), n. That which retains or confines, restraint.

Secret checks readily comply with outward necessities. By Hall.

Retentively (ré-tent'iv-ly), adv. In a retentive manner.

Retentiveness (ré-tent'iv-ness), n. The quality of being retentive; as, retentiveness of memory.

Retenus, n. Retinua.—At his retenus, retained by him. Chaucer.

Retepora (ré-té-po-ra), n. [L. rete, a net, and pora, a pore.] A genus of zoophytes of the class Polyzoon, the cells of which are immersed in a flattened foliaceous expansion pierced like net-work. The typical species (R. cellulosa), found in the Indian and Mediterranean Seas, is known by the name of Retepora cellulosa.

Neptune's ruffles. Fossil species occur in all formations.

Retepora (ré-té-pór), n. One of the Retepora.

Retext (ré-ték's), v. t. [L. retexo, to unweave.] To unweave, to disentangle. By Hackett.

Retexture (ré-ték's-túr), n. The act of weaving again; a second or new texture. 'Retexture of spiritual tissues.' Carlyle.

Retheor, n. [Or rhétor.] An orator or rhetorician. Chaucer.

Retiarum (ré-ti-á-rí-é), n. pl. [L., from rete, a net.] The name given to those spiders which spin a web to entrap their prey.

Retiarius (ré-ti-á-rí-us), n. [L., from rete, a net.] In Rom. antiqu. a gladiator who wore only a short tunic and carried a trident and net. With these implements he endeavoured to entangle and despatch his adversary, who was armed with a helmet, a shield, and sword.

Retiary (ré-ti-á-rí), a. 1. Nettlike. 'Retiary or hanging textures.' Sir T. Browne. 2. Net-making; constructing or using a net or web to catch prey. 'Retiary spiders.' Sir T. Browne.—3. Armed with a net, hence, skilful to entangle. 'Scholastic retiary versatility of logic.' Coleridge.

Retiary (ré-ti-á-rí), n. 1. A gladiator. See RETIARIUS.—2. In zool. a spider which spins a web to catch its prey. See RETIARIUM.

Retice (ré-ti-sen), n. [Fr. reticence, from L. reticulus, from reticeo, to be silent again—re, again, and iceo, to be silent.] 1. The quality of being reticent or of observing studied and continued silence, a refraining from talking; the keeping of one's counsel. 'A reticence or keeping silence.' Holland.

Such a man must have reticence in him, if he walk wearing his heart upon his sleeve. Carlyle.

2. In rhet. aposiopesis (which see).

Reticency (ré-ti-sen-sí), n. Reticence.

Reticent (ré-ti-sen-tí), a. [L. reticens, reticens, pp. of reticeo. See RETICE.] Having a disposition to be silent, reserved; not apt to speak about or reveal any matters, as, he is very reticent about his affairs.

Upon this he is naturally reticent. Lamb.

Reticule (ré-tí-kú), n. [L. reticulum, dim. of rete, a net.] 1. A small net.—2. A reticulate; a hand-bag. [Rare.]—3. Same as reticula. 4. Reticular (ré-tí-kú-lér), a. (See above.) Having the form of a net or of net-work; formed with interstices, as, a reticular body or membrane.—The reticular body, or reticulum. See RETE.—Reticular membrane, substance or tissue. Same as Cellular Membrane or Tissue. See CELLULAR.

Reticularia (ré-tí-kú-lá-rí-a), n. pl. Same as Reticulosa.

Reticularly (ré-tí-kú-lér-ly), adv. In a reticular manner. 'The outer surface of the chorion is reticularly ridged.' Owen.

—To give one his revenge, to offer one a return-match after he has been defeated, as at chess or billiards.—Revenge, Vengeance, Retribution. Revenge is the carrying into effect of a bitter desire to injure an enemy for a wrong done to one's self, or those closely connected with one's self, and is a purely personal feeling. It generally has reference to our equals or superiors, and the revengeful feeling is felt all the more bitterly where it cannot be gratified. Vengeance may arise from no personal feeling, but may be taken for another's wrong as well as one's own. It involves the idea of wrathful retribution, more or less just. It is inflicted on inferiors; as, a slave murders a harsh master out of revenge, and the relatives take vengeance on him in return. Vengeance is the word always used for God's just wrath against sinners. Retribution does not, like the other two, so much concern the person inflicting the injury, but the injury itself. It is, as it were, the natural or due return for a capital of bad deeds previously invested. Any evil result happening to the perpetrator of a crime in consequence of the crime committed is said to be a retribution. Revengeance (ré-venj'ans), n. Revenge; vengeance.

Revengeful (ré-venj'ful), a. Full of revenge or a desire to inflict pain or evil for injury received; harbouring revenge; vindictive; wreaking revenge. 'If thy revengeful heart can not forgive.' Shak.

May my hands Never brandish more revengeful steel Over the glittering helmet of my foe. Shak.

SYN. Vindictive, vengeful, resentful, spiteful, malicious.

Revengefully (ré-venj'ful-li), adv. In a revengeful manner; by way of revenge; vindictively; with the spirit of revenge.

He smiled revengefully, and leaped Upon the floor, thence gazing at the skies, His eyeballs fiery red and glowing vengeance. Dryden.

'The reverberate hills.' Shak. 'A reverberate glass.' B. Jonson. Reverberation (ré-verb'ér-á'shon), n. [See REVERBERATE.] 1. The act of reverberating, or of driving or sending back; particularly, the act of reflecting light, heat, or sound, more especially sound. 'The several reverberations of the same image, from two opposite looking-glasses.' Addison.—2. A sound reverberated or echoed.—3. The circulation of flame in a specially formed furnace, or its return from the top to the bottom of the furnace to produce an intense heat when calcination is required.

Reverberative (ré-verb'ér-át-iv), a. Tending to reverberate; reflective; reverberant. This reverberative influence is what we have extended above as the influence of the mass upon its centres. Dr. Taylor.

Reverberator (ré-verb'ér-át-ér), n. 1. He who or that which reverberates.—2. A reflecting lamp.

Reverberatory (ré-verb'ér-á-to-ri), a. Producing reverberation; acting by reverberation; reverberating; as, a reverberatory

Section of Reverberatory Furnace furnace or kiln.—Reverberatory furnace, a furnace so constructed that the material (as ores, metals, &c.) to be operated on can be heated without coming in direct contact with the fuel. It consists essentially of three parts—namely, a fireplace, a, at one end; in the middle a flat bed or sole, b, on which the material to be heated is placed; and at the other end a chimney, c, to carry off the smoke or fume. Between the fireplace and the bed a low partition wall or fire-bridge is placed, and the whole built over with a low arch, dipping towards the chimney. The flame plays over the fire-bridge, and is reflected or reverberated on the material beneath, hence the name. The reverberatory furnace gives free access of air to the material, and is thus employed for oxidizing impurities in metals and other similar purposes.

Reverberatory (ré-vér'ber-a-to-ri), a. Same as Reverberatory Furnace. See the adjective.

Revere (ré-vér'), v.t. pret. & pp. revered; ppr. revering. [Fr. révéler, l. revereor—re, and revero, to feel awe of, to fear.] To regard with fear or awe, mingled with respect and affection; to venerate; to reverence; to honour in estimation. 'Marcus Aurelius, whom he rather revered as his father than treated as his partner in the empire.' Addison.

*Revered, beloved—O you that hold
A nobler office upon earth
Than arms, or power of brain, or birth
Could give the warrior kings of old.* Tennyson.

SYN. To venerate, adore, reverence.
Reverence (ré-ver'ens), n. [Fr. révérence, from l. revereantia. See REVERE.] 1. Fear, mingled with respect and esteem; veneration.

When quarrels and factions are carried openly it is a sign that the reverence of government is lost. Bacon.
The fear acceptable to God is a filial fear, an awful reverence of the divine nature, proceeding from a just esteem of his perfections, which produces in us an inclination to his service and an unwillingness to offend him. Dr. J. Rogers.

A thousand claims to reverence closed
In her as Mother, Wife, and Queen. Tennyson.

Reverence is nearly equivalent to veneration, but expresses something less of the same emotion. It differs from awe in that it is not akin to the feeling of fear, dread, or terror, while also implying a certain amount of love or affection. We feel reverence for a parent and for an upright magistrate, but we stand in awe of a tyrant.—2. An act of respect or obsequence; a bow or courtesy. 'Fell on his face and did reverence.' 2 Sam. ix. 6.

But yesterday the word of Caesar might Have stood against the world: now lies he there,
And none so poor to do him reverence. Shak.

3. Reverend character; hence, a reverend personage; a common title of the clergy, generally used with the pronouns his, your, &c. 'Forced to lay my reverences by.' Shak. 'A clergyman of holy reverences.' Shak.—Saving your reverence, with all respect to you; a phrase used to introduce an objectionable expression.

Sir, she came in great with child; and longing,
Savour your honour's reverence, for steved prunes. Shak.

SYN. Honour, veneration, awe, adoration.
Reverence (ré-ver'ens), v.t. pret. & pp. revered; ppr. reverencing. To regard with reverence; to regard with fear, mingled with respect and affection.

2. With veneration; with fear of what is great or terrifying.

So reverently men quit the open air
When thunder speaks the angry gods abroad. Dryden.

Reverer (ré-vér'ér), n. One who reveres or venerates.

Reverie (ré-ver'i), n. [Fr. rêverie, from rêver, to dream, a word of doubtful origin.] A waking dream; a brown study; a loose or irregular train of thoughts occurring in musing or meditation. It is apparently in all cases, due to an exaltation or concentration of the faculty of attention. The mind may be occupied, according to the age, tastes, or pursuits of the individual, by calculations, by profound metaphysical speculations, by fanciful visions, or by such trifling and transitory objects as to make no impression on consciousness, so that the period of reverie is left an entire blank in the memory. The most obvious external feature marking this state is the apparent unconsciousness or partial perception of external objects. It is generally, and always at the commencement, at the control of the will.

There are reveries and extravagancies which pass through the minds of wise men as well as fools. Addison.

What sat,
But spoke not, rapt in nameless reverie,
Perchance upon the future man. Tennyson.

Reverist (ré-ver'ist), n. One who is sunk in a reverie; one who indulges in or gives way to reverie. Chambers's Ency.

(b) A change or overthrowing; as, the reversal of a judgment, which amounts to an official declaration that it is false; the reversal of an attainer or of an outlawry, by which the sentence is rendered void.

Reverse (ré-vér's), v.t. pret. & pp. reversed; ppr. reversing. [L. reverter, reverterus—re, back, and verito, to turn.] 1. To turn or put in an opposite or contrary direction or position; to turn upside down; as, to reverse a pyramid or cone. 'My empty glass reversed.' Tennyson.—2. To alter to the opposite; to make quite the contrary, or have contrary bearings or relations.

With what tyranny custom governs men; it makes that reputable in one age, which was a vice in another, and reverses even the distinctions of good and evil. Dr. J. Rogers.

She reversed the conduct of the celebrated vicar of Bray. Sir W. Scott.

3. To overturn; to subvert; as, to reverse the state. Pope.—4. To overthrow; to make void; to annul; to repeal; to revoke; as, to reverse a judgment, sentence, or decree.

Reverse (ré-vér's), n. 1. That which is presented when anything, as a lance, gun, &c., is reverted, or turned in the direction opposite to what is considered its natural position. 'He did so with the reverse of his lance.' Sir W. Scott.—2. A complete change or turn of affairs; sometimes (a) in a good sense.

Meantime, by a reverse of fortune, Stephen becomes rich. Lamb.

Generally (b) in a bad sense; a change for the worse; a misfortune; as, by an unexpected reverse of circumstances an affluent man is reduced to poverty.

To pine in that reverse of doom,
Which sicken'd every living bloom.
And blurr'd the splendour of the sun. Tennyson.

3. A cessation of success; a check; a defeat; as, the troops met with a reverse.—4. A back-handed stroke in fencing. 'To see thee pass thy punto, thy stock, thy reverse, thy distance, thy montant.' Shak.—5. That which is directly opposite or contrary; a contrary; an opposite; generally with the.

The performances to which God has annexed the promises of eternity, are just the reverse of all the pursuits of sense. Dr. J. Rogers.

6. The second or back surface; as, the reverse of a leaf; specifically, the second or back surface of a medal or coin, opposite to that on which the head or principal figure is impressed, the latter being called the obverse.

Rhetic (ré-shík), a. Of or belonging to the Rhetian Alps, specifically, appellation of a series of strata extensively developed in the Rhetian Alps, and constituting the uppermost portion of the triassic, or, according to others, the lowest of the liassic or oolitic group. The strata have also the name of passage-beds from lying between the trias and lias, and are more highly fossiliferous than any of the other members of the triassic period.

Rheto-Romanic (ré-tó-ró-man'ík), a. and n. Belonging to, or that member of, the Romance family of tongues spoken in South Switzerland and in the districts to the north of the Adriatic.

Rhamadan (rá-má-dan), n. Same as RAMADAN.

Rhamnus (rá-má-nús), n. pl. [From typical genus Rhamnus (which see).] A nat. order of exogenous plants, remarkable for having a valvate calyx, hooded petals, opposite to which their stamens are inserted, and a superior or half-inferior fruit which is either dry or fleshy. The species are erect or climbing, often spiny, trees or shrubs, with small greenish inconspicuous flowers, and simple, alternate or opposite, often three to five nerved leaves. They are found over nearly all the world except in the arctic zone. The berries of several species of Rhamnus are violent purgatives, while the fruit of some, as the jujube, is harmless and eatable. The berries of Rhamnus infectoria yield a yellow dye, and R. Frangula yields excellent charcoal for gunpowder.

Rhamnus (rá-má-nús), n. [Gr. rhamnos, a kind of prickly shrub or thorn, perhaps buckthorn or Christ's thorn.] A widely diffused genus of shrubs, containing about sixty species, natives of temperate and tropical regions, of the nat. order Rhamnaceae; the buckthorn. The berries of the common buckthorn (R. cathartica), a British species, possess purgative properties. The juice of the unripe berry dyes yellow. The berries of several species form articles of commerce from the Mediterranean, under the name of French, Turkey, and Persia berries, grains d'Avignon, &c.

Rhamphastus (rá-m-fás'tos). See RAMPHASTUS.

Rhaphis (rá-fís), n. In bot. same as RAPHIS.

Rhaphidea. See RAPHIDEA.

Rhamnus Frangula.

Rhapsode (ráp-sód), n. A rhapsodist. Grote.
Rhapsodic, Rhapsodical (ráp-sód'ík, rap-sód'ík-ál), a. Pertaining to or consisting of rhapsody, confused and unconnected.

They (Pyrrhus's works) . . . by the generality of scholars are looked upon to be rather rhapsodical and confused, than any way poetic or comic. Wood.

Rhapsodically (ráp-sód'ík-ál-ly), adv. In the manner of rhapsody.

Rhapsodist (ráp-sód'íst), n. 1. Originally, among the ancient Greeks, one who composed, recited, or sang rhapsodies; especially, one whose profession was to recite or sing the verses of Homer and other poets.

While the latter (the poet) sang, solely or chiefly, his own compositions to the accompaniment of his lyre, the rhapsodist rehearsed the poems of others. H. Muir.

2. One who recites or sings verses for a livelihood, one who makes and recites verses extempore.

The same populace sit for hours listening to rhapsodists who recite Anacreon. Carlyle.

3. One who writes or speaks in a confused and disconnected manner with strong excitement or affectation of enthusiasm or feeling.

Ask our rhapsodists, if you have nothing but the excellence and loveliness of virtue to preach, and no future rewards and punishments, how many vicious wretches will you ever reclaim? Watts.

Rhapsodize (ráp-sód'íz), v. i. pret. & pp. rhapsodized; ppr. rhapsodizing. To recite rhapsodies; to act as a rhapsodist. Athenæum.

Rhapsodie (ráp-sód'íz), v. t. To sing or recite as a rhapsody; to repeat or rehearse in the manner of a rhapsody.

We may form a probable judgment that the Thebans and the Epigoni were then rhapsodized at Sicron as Homeric productions. Loche.

Rhapsodomancy (ráp-sód'mán-sí), n. [Gr. rhapsodia, rhapsody, and mantia, divination.] Divination by means of verses.

There were various methods of practising this rhapsodomancy. Sometimes they wrote several verses or sentences of a poet on as many pieces of wood, paper, or the like; threw them together in an urn, and drew out one. . . . Sometimes they cast dice on a table on which verses were written, and that on which the dice lodged contained the prediction. A third manner was by opening a book, and picking on some verse at first sight. This method they afterwards called the Sorte Præsentine and afterwards, according to the poet thus made use of, Sorte Homericæ, Sorte Virgilianæ, &c. Rees.

Rhapsody (ráp-sód'í), n. [Gr. rhapsodia—rhapsô, rhapso, to sew, and ôde, a song.] 1. Originally, a short epic poem, or portion of a longer epic such as would be recited by a rhapsodist at one time.

Rhapsody, originally applied to the portions of the poem haphazardly allotted to different performers in the order of recital, afterwards transferred to the twenty-four books into which each work (the Iliad and the Odyssey) was permanently divided by the Alexandrian grammarians. H. Muir.

2. A disjointed and confused series of sentences or statements such as would be composed under excitement, and having no dependence or natural connection, rambling composition. 'A rhapsody of words.' Shak.

He that makes no reflections on what he reads only lands his mind with a rhapsody of tales fit for the entertainment of others. Loche.

Rhatany (rá-tá-ní). See RATANY.

Rhe (ré), n. The Egyptian name for the sun regarded as a divinity. Written also Re and Ra.

Rhea (ré-a), n. 1. In anc. myth. the daughter of Uranus and Ge, wife and sister of Cronus, and mother of Zeus (Jupiter), Hestia (Vesta), Demeter (Ceres), Hera (Juno), Hades (Pluto), &c. —2. A genus of birds, of which the three-toed ostriches of South America are the representatives. See OSTRICH.

Rhea-fibre (ré-a-fí-ber), n. A very valuable East Indian fibre, the produce of a species of nettle (Urtica or Boehmeria tenacissima), somewhat resembling the fibre of the Chinese grass-cloth. It is imported into Britain for textile purposes.

Rhetic (ré'ík), a. Of or pertaining to rhubarb. —Rhetic acid ($C_6H_6O_6$), the yellow, crystalline, granular matter of rhubarb, procured from the plant by means of ether.

Rhein-berry (ríu-bé-rí), n. Buckthorn, a plant belonging to the genus Rhamnus (which see).

Rhematic (ré-mat'ík), n. [Gr. rhematikos, from rheô, a sentence, from rheô, to speak.] The doctrine of propositions or sentences. Coleridge.

Rhematio (ré-mat'ík), a. [See the noun.] A term applied to adjectives derived from verbs. Fitzedward Hall.

Rhematio (ré-mat'ík), a. [See the noun.] A term applied to adjectives derived from verbs. Fitzedward Hall.

Rhematio (ré-mat'ík), a. [See the noun.] A term applied to adjectives derived from verbs. Fitzedward Hall.

Rhenish (ren'ish), a. Pertaining to the river Rhine; as, Rhenish wine: sometimes used absolutely for Rhenish wine or Rhine wine: See RHINE WINE.

He poured a flagon of Rhenish on my head once. Shak.

—Rhenish architecture, the style which Romanesque architecture assumed in the countries bordering upon the Rhine, and which dates from nearly the same period as Lombard architecture. It is round-arched; the earliest churches seem to have been circular, but the circular form was absorbed into the rectangular form in the shape of a western apse. There were also a number of small circular or octagonal towers. The arcaded galleries at the eaves, and the richly carved capitals are among the most beautiful features of the style. From the use of the round arch and solid walls, the exteriors are free from the great mass of buttresses used in Gothic buildings.

Rheochord (rê'ô-kord), n. [Gr. rhêô, to flow, and chordê, a chord.] A metallic wire used in measuring the resistance, or varying the strength of an electric current, in proportion to the greater or less length of it inserted in the circuit.

Rheometer (rê'om-ët-ër), n. [Gr. rhêô, to flow, and metron, measure.] Another name for the electrometer or galvanometer.

Rheometric (rê'ô-met'rik), a. Pertaining to a rheometer or its use.

Rheometry (rê'om-ët-ri), n. [Gr. rhêô, to flow, and metron, measure.] 1. In math. the differential and integral calculus; fluxions.—2. In physics, the method of measuring the velocity and force of electric, &c., currents.

Rheomotor (rê'ô-mô-tër), n. [Gr. rhêô, to flow, and L. motor, a mover.] Any apparatus, as an electrical or galvanic battery, by which an electric or galvanic current is originated.

Rheophore (rê'ô-fôr), n. [Gr. rhêô, to flow, and phorêô, from phêrô, to bear.] Ampère's name for the connecting wire of a voltaic apparatus, as being the transmitter of the current.

Rheoscope (rê'ô-skôp), n. [Gr. rhêô, to flow, and skôpêô, to view.] An instrument by which the existence of an electric, galvanic, or magnetic current may be ascertained.

Rheostat (rê'ô-stat), n. [Gr. rhêô, to flow, and statos, that stands still.] In electromagnetism, an instrument for regulating or adjusting a circuit so that any required degree of force may be maintained. Wheatstone.

Rheotome (rê'ô-tôm), n. [Gr. rhêô, to flow, and tomêô, a cutting, from temnô, to cut.] An instrument for periodically interrupting an electric current. Paraday.

Rheotrope (rê'ô-trôp), n. [Gr. rhêô, to flow, and tropêô, a turn, from trépô, to turn.] An instrument for periodically changing the direction of an electric current. Paraday.

Rhesus (rê'sus), n. The name of a genus of monkeys, including the bruh or pig-tailed monkey (R. nemestrinus), inhabiting the Malay Peninsula and the islands of the Indian Archipelago. It is often domesticated. The name rhesus monkey is also given to the Macacus Rhesus, a species of Indian monkey, held in great veneration by the natives, and of which large numbers swarm about the temples. It is partially migratory, visiting in summer districts of the Himalayas which are much too cold for it in winter.

Rhetian (rê'shi-an), a. Same as Rhætian.

Rhetor (rê'tor), n. [L., from Gr. rhêtôr, an orator or speaker.] A rhetorician.

Your hearing, what is it but as of a rhetor at a desk, to commend or dislike? Hammond.

Rhetoric (ret'or-ik), n. [Fr. rhétorique, L. rhêtorikê, from Gr. rhêtorikê (techê, art, understood), from rhêtôr, a public speaker, from rhêô, to say, to speak.] 1. The art or branch of knowledge which treats of the rules or principles underlying all effective composition whether in prose or verse; or, as defined by Campbell, the art of discourse, by discourse being understood all discourse or composition spoken or written. Three kinds of discourse are recognized in rhetoric: (1) representative discourse, the object of which is to convey information, the matter being of more importance than the form; under this head are treated such topics as description, narration, and exposition; (2) poetry, in which the matter and purpose are subordinate to the form; (3) oratory, which proposes an end to be attained, to which matter and form are more or less subservient.—2. The art which teaches oratory; the rules that govern the art of speaking with propriety, elegance, and force, or that regulate argumentative prose composition. See extract.

Of rhetoric various definitions have been given by various writers. . . . It is evident that, in its primary significance, rhetoric had reference to public speaking alone, as its etymology implies. But as most of the rules for speaking are of course applicable equally to writing, an extension of the term naturally took place. . . . I propose . . . to treat of 'argumentative composition' generally and exclusively, considering rhetoric (in conformity with the very just and philosophical view of Aristotle) as an offshoot from logic. Abb. 11 habitly

3. Rhetoric exhibited in language; eloquence, especially artificial eloquence, as opposed to that which is natural and real; flashy oratory; declamation.

Women are better qualified to succeed in oratory than men. It is certain, too, that they are possessed of some springs of rhetoric which men want, such as tears, fainting fits, and the like, which I have seen employed upon occasion, with good success. Spectator.

4. The power of persuasion or influencing; as, the rhetoric of the heart or eyes. 'Sweet silent rhetoric of persuading eyes.' Daniel.—Rhetoric, Oratory. The former designates the principles or science of oratory; the latter the practice. A man may be thoroughly skilled in the rules of rhetoric and yet be no orator, and vice versa.

Rhetorical (re-tor'ik-al), a. Pertaining to, containing, or involving rhetoric; oratorical; as, a rhetorical art; a rhetorical treatise; a rhetorical flourish.

They permit him to leave their poetical taste ungratified, provided that he gratifies their rhetorical sense and their curiosity. Matt. Arnold.

Rhetorically (re-tor'ik-al-li), adv. In a rhetorical manner; according to the rules of rhetoric; as, to treat a subject rhetorically; a discourse rhetorically delivered.

Rhetoricate (re-tor'ik-ât), v. t. To play the orator.

A person ready to sink under his wants has neither time nor heart to rhetoricate, or make flourishes. South.

Rhetorication (re-tor'ik-â'shon), n. Rhetorical amplification. 'Their rhetorications and equivocal expressions.' Waterland.

Rhetorician (ret-or'i-shan), n. [Fr. rhétoricien. See RHETORIC.] 1. One who teaches the art of rhetoric, or the principles and rules of correct and elegant speaking and writing; one who teaches oratory.

The ancient sophists and rhetoricians, who had young auditors, lived till they were a hundred years old. Bacon.

2. One well versed in the rules and principles of rhetoric.

The 'understanding' is that by which a man becomes a mere logician, and a mere rhetorician. F. W. Robertson.

3. A public speaker; especially, one who speaks for show; a declaimer.

Or played at Lyons a declaiming prize. At which the vanquish'd rhetorician dies. Dryden.

Rhetorician (ret-or'i-shan), a. Suited to a master of rhetoric. 'Rhetorician pride.' Sir R. Blackmore.

Rhetorize (rê'tor-iz), v. t. To play the orator. Colgrave.

Rhetorize (rê'tor-iz), v. t. To represent by a figure of oratory; to introduce by a rhetorical device. Milton.

Rheum (rûm), n. [Gr. rhêuma, from rhêô, to flow.] 1. An increased action of the excretory vessels of any organ; but generally applied to the increased action of mucous glands, attended with increased discharge and an altered state of their excreted fluids.

I have a rheum in mine eyes too. Shak.

2. A thin serous fluid, secreted by the mucous glands, &c., as in catarrh; humid matter which collects in the eyes, nose, or mouth, as tears, saliva, and the like. 'You that did void your rheum upon my beard.' Shak.

Rheum (rê'um), n. (From rhubarb, It. rubarbaro. See RHUBARB.) A genus of plants of the nat. order Polygonaceæ, including the different species of plants which yield the stalks and root so well known by the name of rhubarb (which see).

Rheuma (rû'ma), n. [Gr. rhêuma.] Rheum (which see).

Rheumatic, Rheumatismal (rû-mat'ik, rû-mat'ik-al), a. [L. rheumaticus; Gr. rhêumatikos, from rhêuma, rheum (which see).] Pertaining to rheumatism or partaking of its nature; affected with rheumatism; as, rheumatic pains or affections.

Therefore the moon, the governess of floods, Put in her anger, washes all the air, That rheumatic diseases do abound. Shak.

Rheumatism (rû'ma-tizm), n. [L. rheumatinus; Gr. rheumatismos, from rhêuma, a watery humour, from rhêô, to flow, the ancients supposing the disease to proceed from a defluxion of humours.] A painful inflammation affecting muscles and joints of the human body, chiefly the larger joints, as the hips, knees, shoulders, &c., attended by swelling and stiffness. It is occasionally accompanied by fever, when it constitutes acute rheumatism or rheumatic fever, which frequently lapses gradually into chronic rheumatism. There are several varieties of chronic rheumatism, as articular rheumatism, which occurs in the joints and muscles of the extremities; lumbago, which occurs in the loins; sciatica, occurring in the hip-joint; &c.

Rheumatismal (rû-ma-tiz'mal), a. Rheumatic.

Rheumatism-root (rû'ma-tizm-rôt), n. See TWIN-LEAF.

Rheumatize (rû'ma-tiz), n. Rheumatism. [Provincial English or Scotch.]

I did feel a rheumatize in my backspaul yesternoe. Sir W. Scott.

Rheumy (rûm'i), a. 1. Full of rheum or watery matter; consisting of rheum or partaking of its nature.

His head and rheumy eyes distill in showers. Dryden.

2. Affected with rheum.—3. Causing rheum or rheumatism.

And tempt the rheumy and unpurged air To add unto his sickness. Shak.

Rhexia (rek'si-a), n. [Gr. rhêxis, rupture, from some species having been formerly used in the cure of rupture.] A small genus of Melastomaceæ, commonly called deer-grass or meadow-beauty. The species are low perennial, often bristly, herbs, and have sessile, three to five nerved, bristle-edged leaves, and large, showy, cymose flowers.

Rhigolene (rig'ô-lên), n. [Gr. rhigô, cold, and L. oleum, oil.] A light coal-oil, of low boiling-point, used in surgical operations to render the skin insensible to pain.

Rhime (rim). See RHYME.

Rhinacanthus (ri-na-kan'thus), n. [Gr. rhîs, rhinos, a snout, and akanthos, a prickly plant, from akantha, a prickle, a spine.] A genus of Indian plants, nat. order Acanthaceæ. R. communis is a native of India. The roots are used by the natives to cure ringworm, and, boiled in milk, are reckoned an aphrodisiac. They resemble Justicia in habit, and have small white flowers in terminal spikes.

Rhinal (ri'nal), a. [Gr. rhîs, rhinos, the nose.] Pertaining to the nose.

Rhinanthaceæ (ri-nan-thi'sê-â), a. pl. An order of dicotyledons established by Jussieu, but now incorporated with Scrophulariaceæ.

Rhinanthus (ri-nan'thus), n. [Gr. rhîs, rhinos, a snout, and anthos, a flower, in allusion to the appearance of the corolla.] A genus of annual, probably parasitic, herbs, with opposite serrate leaves, and nodding spikes of yellow flowers, nat. order Scrophulariaceæ. They are natives of Europe, Northern Asia, and North America. Two of them are British, and are known by the name of yellow-rattle.

Rhind-mart (rind'märt), n. In Scots law, a word of occasional occurrence in the reddendo of charters in the north of Scotland to signify any species of horned cattle given at Martinmas as part of the rent or feu-duty. Bell.

Rhine (rin), n. [A Sax. rynne, a water-course; comp. runnel, and Gr. rhînos, a channel.] A water-course or ditch. [Provincial.]

Sedgemoor . . . was intersected by many deep and wide trenches which, in that country, are called rhines. Macaulay.

Rhinencephalic (rin-en-sêf'ik), n. [Gr. rhîs, rhinos, the nose, and encephalêos, the brain.] Pertaining to the nose and brain, specifically, applied to the prolongation of the substance of the brain forming the olfactory nerves.

Rhinencephalon (rin-en-sêf'â-lon), n. [See above.] In compar. anat. the anterior division of the brain, in front of the prosencephalon or cerebral hemisphere. From this are given off nerves to the olfactory organs.

Rhine Wine (rin win), n. A general term for wines produced on the Rhine, but more specifically for those of the Rheingau, a district along the Rhine in the south-west of Nassau, and formerly belonging to the archbishopric of Mayence. Among the best known and most valuable of the white Rhine wines are Johannisberg, Hochheimer, Rudesheimer, Steinberger, Rothenberger, and Markgräber. The red wines are not so much esteemed. Of these Amsbach is the most celebrated. The wines produced in the Moselle are of inferior quality.

Rhino (rî'nô), n. A cast ward for gold and silver of money.

A rhino setting we had of it as long as the rhino lasted. — Mercury.

Rhinobatis (rî-nô-bat'is), n. pl. (Or rhinobatis, the nose, and batis, a ray.) The shark rays or beaked rays, a family of placoid fishes, allied to rays, occurring in the character of the shark and the rays, but referred to the latter in virtue of the position of the gill openings and the nature of the teeth. The muzzle is generally beaked and pointed, the mouth undelimited, and the teeth rounded or elliptical (in some broader than long), the body being smooth. The saw fish is the most remarkable member of the family. — See SAW FISH.

Rhinoceros, Rhinocerotidae (rî-nô-sêr'is), n. Pertaining to the rhinoceros, resembling the rhinoceros, turning up like the horn on the snout of a rhinoceros, homonymously applied in the fowler to a turned up nose.

Rhinoceros (rî-nô-sêr'is), n. [L. rhinoceros; Or rhinoceros, nose-horn—rhin, rhinos, the nose, and rhinos, a horn.] A genus of pachyderms, ungulates or hoofed mammals, co-extensive with the family Rhinocerotidae, and nearly allied to the elephant, the hippopotamus, the tapir, &c. They are large ungulate animals, having a very thick skin which is usually thrown into deep folds. The muzzle is rounded and blunt, and there are seven molars on each side of each jaw, there are no canines, but there are usually incisor teeth in both jaws. The skull is pyramidal, and the nasal bones are enormously developed. The feet are furnished with three toes each, encased in hoofs. The nasal bones usually support one or two horns, which are composed of longitudinal fibres agglutinated together, and are of the nature of epidermic growths, somewhat analogous to hairs. When two horns are present the hinder one rises on the frontal bone, and is placed on the middle line of the head behind the anterior horn. The posterior horn is generally shorter than the anterior, and always differs from it in shape. They live in marshy places, and subsist chiefly on grasses and the foliage of trees. They are at the present time exclusively confined to the warmer parts of the eastern hemisphere, but several extinct species ranged over the greater part of Europe, their remains having been discovered in the miocene and subsequent tertiary strata of that continent. One extinct species, R. tiberianus, or walrus rhinoceros.

only of insectivorous Chiroptera, including the greater and lesser horseshoe-bats of this country. The species of this family have the nose furnished with a crumpled membrane, which is sometimes very complicated, and has more or less the appearance of a horseshoe. These appendages are highly sensitive, and most likely prove of great service in directing the members of the group in their flight.

Rhinoplastic (rî-nô-plas'tik), a. (Or rhinoplastic, the nose, and plastic, to form.) Forming a nose—Rhinoplastic operation, a surgical operation for forming an artificial nose, or restoring a nose partly lost, sometimes called the Painlevé operation, from Painlevé, an Italian surgeon who first performed it. It generally consists in bringing down a triangular portion of skin from the forehead, twisting it round and causing it to adhere by its under surface and edges to the part of the nose remaining. The skin may also be taken from another part of the body. The extreme joint of one of the fingers has been used in supporting such an artificial nose.

Rhinoplasty (rî-nô-plas'ti), n. Same as Rhinoplastic operation. — See RHINOPLASTIC. Rhinoscope (rî-nô-skôp), n. (Or rhin, rhinos, the nose, and skopos, to view.) A small mirror for inspecting the passages of the nose.

Rhinocrotop (rî-nô-skôp'tik), a. Of or pertaining to the rhinocrotop.

Rhinocrotopy (rî-nô-skôp'ti), n. Inspection of the nasal passages by means of the rhinocrotop.

Rhinoptera (rî-nô-ptêr'a), n. pl. (Or rhinoptera, a fin, and pteron, a wing.) Fan-winged insects, an order of insects which have only one pair of wings fully developed, and then on the metathorax. This is Latreille's name for the order of insects designated by Kirby Strepsiptera, and which includes the two genera Xenos and Styllops. — See STRAPSIPTEA.

Rhipsalis (rî-psa-lis), n. A genus of Cactaceae consisting of a considerable number of small fleshy jointed branched, leafless plants usually growing upon trees, varying considerably in general appearance, and inhabiting Florida and Central America, Mexico, and the West Indies.

Rhinanth (rî-nan-th), n. A plant belonging to the Rhizanthem.

Rhinanthem (rî-nan-thê-n), n. pl. (Or rhinanthem, a root, and anthem, a flower.) One of the five classes into which Lindley divided the vegetable kingdom. It consists of plants destitute of true leaves, but with short abortive stems perennating on roots, and includes the orders Cytinaceae, Rafflesiaceae, and Balanophoraceae. By other botanists these orders are placed widely apart.

Rhinobolus (rî-nô-bô-lô's), n. pl. (From Rhinobolus, the principal genus.) A small family of tropical American dicotyledonous trees, comprising only the genera Caryocarpus or Rhinobolus and Antheodiscus. The flowers or corolla parts of the above, one of the most delicious seeds of the nut kind, are the produce of Caryocarpus coniforme and butyraceum, and the latter tree yields excellent timber. They are now referred to Tournefortiaceae.

Rhinocarpus (rî-nô-kar'pus), n. (Or rhin, a root, and carpus, fruit.) In botany applied to those plants whose roots endure many years, but whose stems perish annually as herbaceous plants.

Rhinophthalmia (rî-nô-ftôl'mi), n. pl. (Or rhin, a root, and ophthalmia, the head.) A name proposed for a group of low crustaceans, of the sub-class Epison, but nearly allied to the cirripedes or barnacles. They are fixed, and are commonly found parasitic on crabs, and are greatly deformed when adult, but active and free-swimming when young.

Rhinorhiza (rî-nô-rî-zis), n. A genus of crinoids or lily stems represented by the L. Lophoceros of Linn. Rhinorhiza is nearly allied to the fossil Apocrinids of the chalk.

Rhinodunt (rî-nô-dunt), n. (Or rhin, a root, and dunt, a denture, a tooth.) A term applied to reptiles whose teeth, like those of the crocodiles, are planted in sockets.

Rhizophora (rî-zô-for'a), n. A genus of fossil graptolite fishes, allied to reptiles, occurring in the coal measures, originally confounded with Holoptichia, but differing from the latter in the large size of the species, the form of the scales, and in the teeth.

Rhizogen (rî-zô-jen), n. (Or rhiz, a root, and genos, to produce.) A parasitic plant growing on the roots of others. Rhizogens constitute the third class in Dr. Lindley's system.

Rhizoid, Rhizoides (rî-zôid, rî-zôid-ôz), n. (Or rhiz, a root, and oides, likeness.) In bot. resembling a root.

Rhizoma (rî-zô-ma), n. Same as Rhizome.

Rhizomania (rî-zô-mâ-ni-a), n. (Or rhiz, a root, and mania, madness.) Is bot. an abnormal development of roots peculiar to many plants, as ivy, arrow poise, figs, &c., which send out roots from various parts, just as trees produce adventitious buds. In some plants rhizomania is an indication that there is something wrong with the true root, in consequence of which it cannot supply sufficient food to the plant. In such cases rhizomania is an effort of nature to supply the deficiency. This is the case in vines and common laurel. In the latter plant rhizomania generally forebodes death. The phenomenon is also frequently seen in apple trees, from the stems of which bundles of roots are sent out. These catching moisture and finally decaying are a cause of canker on the tree.

Rhizome (rî-zô-mô or rî-zô-m), n. (Or rhiz, a rooted state, from rhizos, to plant, from rhiz, a root.) In bot. a short stem running also free of the ground, subterranean, shoots at its top decaying at the base in the form, the form it may be wholly covered with the soil. Called also Rhizotoma.

Rhizomorpha (rî-zô-môr'f), n. (Or rhiz, a root, and morph, shape.) Rhizome or Rhizotoma of Linn. The same given to what was formerly supposed to be a genus of Fungi, but in reality comprising a great number of root-like productions which are simply particular states of Polypori, Hypoxyla, &c., many of which owe their peculiar fitness to their growing between the wood and bark of forest trees, and being thus strongly compressed. Other matters, as roots of willows, elms, and herbaceous plants rising up drain tiles or other cavities, have been referred to this genus. Frim believes that one true species, R. subterranea is produced in stems to which, from its phosphorescence, it gives a luminous appearance. In the coal-mines near Dresden this species is described as giving those places the appearance of an enchanted castle, the roof, walls, and pillars are entirely covered with it, its beautiful light almost dazing the eye. The light is found to increase with the temperature of the mines.

Rhizomorphoid, Rhizomorphous (rî-zô-môr'fôid, rî-zô-môr'fôz), a. (Or rhiz, a root, morph, shape, and oides, likeness.) Rootlike in form.

Rhizomys (rî-zô-mis), n. (Or rhiz, a root, and mys, a mouse.) A genus of rodents remarkable for their very small eyes and ears. A good example of this genus is the bay bamboo rat (R. batavi), which inhabits Malacca and China. It is about as large as a rabbit, and is very harmful to the bamboo, on the root of which it feeds. The front of the incisor teeth is bright red.

Rhinophaga (rî-nô-fa-ga), n. pl. (Or rhin, a root, and phago, to eat.) Root-eaters, one of the five sections into which Owen divides the mariposids, of which the most characteristic species is the Australian one-belt. — See WORMS.

Rhinophagus (rî-nô-fa-gus), n. (Or rhin, a root and phago, to eat.) Feeding on roots.

Rhinophora (rî-nô-fô-râ), n. (Or rhin, a root, and phora, to bear.) A genus of trees which gives its name to the next order Rhizophoraceae. The species are known by the name of mangrove (— See MANGROVE), they are remarkable for their seeds germinating

Indian Rhinoceros (Rhinoceros indicus)

England. Of the existing one-horned species the best known is the Indian rhinoceros (R. indicus). It grows to the height of 5 feet, the horns is seldom very long. It inhabits Bengal and a considerable portion of Asia. Of the two-horned species a well known example is the African rhinoceros (R. bicornis), which occurs in Cape Colony and in the southern parts of the African continent. Rhinoceros bicornis, a name given to a variety of horribil. — See HORRIBIL.

Rhinoceros-bird (rî-nô-sêr'is bîrd), n. A bird of the genus Buccones (B. rhinoceros), a species of Bucconis. — See HORRIBIL.

Rhinocerotidae, Rhinocerotids (rî-nô-sêr'is rî-nô-sêr'is dâ), n. pl. A family of ungulate mammals, comprising the various species of rhinoceros. — See RHINOCEROS.

Rhinophthalmia (rî-nô-ftôl'mi), n. pl. (Or rhin, rhinos, the nose, and ophthalmia, a view.) A fa-

Head of Rhinoptera (bat)

even while attached to the branches, and also for the numerous adventitious root-like projections which serve as supports for the stem. The wood of several species is hard and durable, and the bark astringent. The bark of R. gymnorhiza is used in India for dyeing black. The species are natives of the tropics, where they root in the mud, and form a dense thicket down to the verge of the water.

Mangrove (Rhizophora mangle)

Rhizophoraceæ (rī zōf'ō-rē'ō-sē) a. pl. The mangroves, a natural order of trees of which the genus Rhizophora is the type. See RHIZOPHORA.

Rhizophorous (rī zōf'ō-rō-s) a. In bot. relating to the mangrove, a natural order of trees of which the genus Rhizophora is the type.

Rhisopod (rī zō-pod) a. A member of the order Rhizopoda.

Rhizopoda (rī zōf'ō-dē) a. pl. [Gr. rhiza, a root, and pous, pusher, a foot.] The lowest class of the Protozoa, comprehending those members which are destitute of a mouth, are single or compound, and possess the power of emitting pseudopodia. They are usually minute, frequently microscopic, but some (such as the sponges) attain considerable size. Structurally the rhizopoda consist of a mass of sarcodæ, destitute of organs for digestion, &c. The characteristic from which they have their name is their capability of protruding processes (pseudopodia) from any part of their substance, sometimes as filaments or threads and sometimes finger-shaped, and retracting them at pleasure. The Amoeba (which see) may be regarded as a typical rhizopod. Some, as the Forams, are invested with a calcareous shell, sometimes consisting of one cell, but generally of an aggregation of minute chambers or cells, through the pores of which they protrude their filæ (the processes). The class has been divided into five orders—Monera, Amoebæ, Foraminifera, Radiolaria, and Spongia, of which the last is occasionally considered a separate class. See separate entries.

Rhizostoma (rī zō-stō-mā) a. [Gr. rhiza, a root, and stoma, a mouth.] A genus of colonial animals belonging to the order Lucernaria. These animals resemble large jelly fishes, and may attain a diameter of 1 foot or more. They are chiefly met with in tropical seas, and possess powerful stinging cells. R. Cassini is a familiar species. The Rhizostoma have their sense-organs covered by a 'hood,' and hence are 'hidden-eyed' Molans.

Rhizostoma (rī zō-stō-mā) a. A hydromedusa of the section Discophora and order Lucernaria.

Rhizostomidæ (rī zō-stō-mī-dē) a. pl. [Gr. rhiza, a root, and stoma, a mouth.] A family of Hydromedusa of the order Lucernaria, in which reproductive elements are developed in free zooids, produced by fission, the umbrellæ or disc of the generative zooids is without marginal tentacles, and the polypites are numerous, modified and depending on a dentiform or tree-shaped mass from the umbrellæ. The genus Rhizostoma is the type. See RHIZOSTOMA.

Rhizostoma (rī zō-stō-mā) a. [Gr. rhiza, a root, and stoma, arrangement.] In bot. the arrangement of the roots.

Rhodolose, Rhodolose (rō dō-lō-sē) a. [Gr. rhodon, a rose, and lōs, latex, salt.] Red or colour vitriol, sulphate of cobalt.

Rhodanite (rō-dan'itē) a. [Gr. rhodon, a rose.] A term applied to an acid, called also Sulphuric Acid, which produces a red colour with peroxide of iron.

Rhodantha (rō-dan'thē) a. [Gr. rhodon, a rose, and anthos, a flower.] A beautiful genus of Compositæ found in Western Australia. The only species is R. Hampland, of which there are several varieties, differing from each other mainly in the size and colour of the flower heads, which have the dry character of what are commonly called 'everlastings.' It is an annual, rising from 1 to 1½ foot high, with an erect branching stem, oblong blunt entire stem clasping leaves of a glaucous green colour, and flower heads, varying from pale rose to deep purple, supported on stalks arranged in a corymbose manner.

Rhodes-wind (rōd'r-wind) a. The wind of the West Indian tree Amyris latifolia. Called also Candlewood.

Rhodian (rō-dī-an) a. Pertaining to Rhodes, an island of the Mediterranean, or, Rhodian law, the earliest system of marine law known to history, said to be compiled by the Rhodians after they had by their commerce and naval victories obtained the sovereignty of the sea, about 900 B.C.

Rhodium (rō-dī-on) a. A native or inhabitant of Rhodes.

Rhodic-chloride (rō-dī-ō-khō-rīd) a. In chem. a double chloride of rhodium and the alkali metals.

Rhodiola (rō-dī-ō-lā) a. A genus of alpine plants belonging to the nat. order Cruciferae. The R. rosea, now frequently called Sedum Rhodiola or rose-root, is a British plant found on cliffs along the sea and on high mountains. It is very common in the Highlands of Scotland and the Hebrides. The root, which is thick and fleshy, smells like a rose. The leaves are glaucous, sessile and alternate and the yellow or purplish flowers are in compact corymbose cymes. It is found throughout Western Europe, including the Arctic regions, the Himalayas, and east and west North America.

Rhodium (rō-dī-on) a. [Gr. rhodon, a rose, on account of the red colour of some of its salts, especially of the chloride, when dissolved in water.] Sym. Rh. at. wt. 104.2. A metal discovered in the beginning of the present century by Wollaston, associated with palladium in the ore of platinum. Rhodium is very infusible, scarcely softening in the flame of the oxyhydrogen blow-pipe. When fused it has a white colour and a metallic lustre. It is grayish white in colour, extremely hard, brittle, and has a sp. gr. of 12.1. It unites with oxygen at a red heat, a mixture of peroxide and protoxide being formed. When pure it is not acted upon by any acid, but if in the state of an alloy it is dissolved by aqua regia. It has been used for the points of metallic pens.

Rhodocritite (rō-dōk'rī-tit) a. [See RHODOCRITUS.] Is pallens, a rose-cerinite.

Rhodocrinus (rō-dō-k'rī-nus) a. [Gr. rhodon, a rose, and crinus, a lily.] A genus of paleontological crinities with a round and sometimes slightly pentagonal column, formed of numerous joints, and perforated by a pentagonal alimentary canal the rose-cerinites.

Rhododendron (rō-dō-dēn'drōn) a. [Gr. rhodon, a rose, and dendron, a tree.] A genus of highly-prized corymb. They are nearly related to each other, and occur both in the New and Old World. The varieties cultivated in the country belong chiefly to R. ponticum, native of the coasts of the Black Sea, &c. R. coccineum, an American species, &c. R. hybridum between these two. The leaves. R. corymbosum a Siberian species with yellow flowers, possess narcotic properties and have a great reputation as a remedy for chronic rheumatism. Some of the most ornamental species are natives of the Himalayas. R. ferrugineum, found wild in the island, is called the rose of the Alps.

Rhododendron (rō-dō-mē-lā'ō-dē) a. pl. [Gr. rhodon, a rose, and dendron, an apple, a fruit. An order of Scrophularia or Rhododendronaceæ, consisting of red or brown evergreen trees with a leafy or siliform, articulated or articulated frond composed of polygonal cells. There are several British species.

Rhododendrite (rō-dō-mēn'tit) a. A synonym spelling of Rhododendrite.

Rhodonite (rō-dō-nit) a. [Gr. rhodon, a rose.] A mineral consisting chiefly of magnesian silicate, mixed with silicate of iron calcium, &c.

Rhodospiræum (rō-dō-spēr'ō-sē) a. p. [Gr. rhodon, a rose, and spiræum, a weed.] One of the three divisions into which algae have been divided the two others being the Mezocarpus and Chlorocarpus. The species, with one or two exceptions, are marine, and are distinguished for their brilliant permanent tints of a rose-red or purple, corymb leaf-like fronds, and the collection of their spores into tri, or if scattered, by the spores being arranged on a ternary plan. The division comprises the orders Rhododermis, Laurenciales, Cornuclales, Leptocarpales, Rhododermis, Cryptodermis, and Ceramiales. Called also Rhododermis.

Rhodospores (rō-dō-spēr'ō-sē) a. pl. Same as Rhododermis.

Rhodostaurite (rō-dō-stūr'ō-tit) a. [Gr. rhodon, a rose, and staurite, a cross.] A crucian. R. Jansoni.

Rhodymia (rō-dī-mē-lā) a. [Gr. rhodon, a rose, and myia, a membrane.] The typical genus of the nat. order of rose-spined algae. Rhodymia is the most common of the well known algae of our seas.

Rhodymenaceæ (rō-dī-mē-lā'ō-sē) a. pl. An order of Floridanæ consisting of purple or blood red colour. The roots are disc-like or branched, much matted, the frond, which is composed of polygonal cells, is either leafy or siliform, and much branched, never articulate. The species are widely distributed. Rhodymenia palmata, or dulse, is a well known example. Many of the species of the genus Gracilaria are largely used in the East as ingredients in soups, jellies, &c., and a substitute for glue. One of them is the agar-agar of the Chinese.

Rhomb (rom) a. [Fr. rhombe, L. rhombus, from Gr. rhombos.] 1. In geom. a rhombus, an oblique angled equilateral parallelogram, or a quadrilateral figure whose sides are equal, and the opposite sides parallel, but the angles unequal, each of the angles being obtuse and two acute. — 2. In crystal. a solid bounded by six equal and similar rhombic planes, a rhombodendron. — Fraser's rhomb, a rhomb of calcareous, so cut that a ray of light entering one of its faces at right angles shall emerge at right angles at the opposite face, after undergoing within the rhomb, at its other faces, two total reflections. It is used to produce a ray circularly polarized, which again becomes plane-polarized on being transmitted through a second Fraser's rhomb.

Rhombic (rom'bik) a. Having the figure of a rhomb.

Rhombicubical (rom-bē-bē-dē) a. [See RHOMBICUBIC.] 1. In geom. relating to a rhombicubical having form derived from the rhombodendron. 2. In crystal. relating to a system of forms known by the presence of four axes, three of which are in the same plane and inclined to each other at an angle of 60°, whilst the remaining fourth axis is perpendicular to the three, as in the regular octahedron and the rhombodendron.

Rhombodendron (rom-bē-bē-dē) a. [Gr. rhombos, a rhomb, and dendron, a tree.] In geom. and crystal. a solid bounded by six rhombic planes, a rhomb.

Rhomboid (rom'boid) a. [Gr. rhombos, rhomb, and eidos, form.] 1. In geom. a evergreen shrub very common in gardens, belonging to the nat. order Ericaceæ. The species have alternate, entire, evergreen leaves, and ornamental flowers disposed in quadrilateral figure whose opposite sides and angles are equal, but which is neither equilateral nor equiangular. — 2. In geometry, a solid having a rhomboidal form with three axes of unequal lengths, two of which are at right angles to each other, whilst the third is so inclined as to be perpendicular to one of the two axes, and oblique to the other.

Rhomboid (rom'boid), a. Rhomboid-shaped; rhomboidal; specifically, (a) in anat. applied to a thin, broad, and obliquely square fleshy muscle between the base of the scapula and the spine dorsal. (b) in bot. applied to a diamond-shaped leaf: called also a rhomboidal leaf.

Rhomboidal (rom-boid'al), a. Having the shape of a rhomboid, or a shape approaching it.

A rhomb of Iceland spar, a solid bounded by its equal and similar rhomboidal surfaces. Brewster.

Rhomboides (rom-boid'eis), n. A rhomboid. 'A geometrical rhomboides.' Milton. [Rare.]

Rhomboid-ovate (rom-boid'-o-vat'), a. Between rhomboid and oval in shape, partly rhomboid, partly oval.

Rhomb-spar (rom'spär), n. A mineral of a grayish white, containing massive, disseminated and crystallized in rhomboids, imbedded in chlorite slate, limestone, &c. It consists chiefly of carbonates of lime and magnesia.

Rhombus (rom'buz), n. 1. In geom. same as Rhomb. — 2. A genus of fishes comprising the turbot, brill, and some others of less importance, so named from their rhomboidal form.

Rhombus (rom'buz), a. Relating or pertaining to rhombuses; as, rhombus fluctuation. Druggist.

Rhombiclast (romb-ik'st), a. [L. rhombus, a tablet, a stone, and clastus, scintilla, ppr. of clastus, to scintillate.] Scintillating. [Rare.]

Rhombus (rom'buz), n. [L. from Gr. rhombos, a moving sound.] In most the same as Rhombus or Rhombus; also the deep moving which accompanies inspiration in some diseases, particularly in apoplexy; stertor.

Rhone (rön), n. [Scotch.] A rain-water pipe. Scott. Low.

Rhonde-bok (rö'de-bok'), n. Same as Ronde-bok.

Rhopale (rö-pal'e), a. [Gr. rhōpalos, a club which from the handle to the tip grows bigger and bigger.] In prose applied to a line in which each succeeding word contains a syllable more than that preceding it. 'Hope overcomes miserable individuals' is an example.

Rhopalocera (rö-pal'-o-sä), n. pl. [Gr. rhōpalos, a club, a horn, a horn.] That section of lepidopterous insects which comprises the diurnal Lepidoptera, or butterflies, distinguished by the vertical position of the wings during repose (the moths having them horizontal), and by their having the antennae slender and terminated by a small club (whence the name).

Rhopalodon (rö-pal'-o-don), a. [Gr. rhōpalos, a club, and odous, a tooth.] A tooth. The name given to a fossil genus of reptiles from the Permian of Russia, apparently related to the lizards from the Permian of Bristol. The name is from the shape of the tooth, which with some fragments of the jaw constitutes all the remains that have been found.

Rhombiculus (rö-bis-ik'ulus), n. Same as Rhombus.

Rhubarb (rö'bärb), n. [Fr. rhubarbe, It. rubarbo, barbarus, from L. rhē barbarus, Gr. rhē barbaros; said to be from rhē, a name of the river Volga, and barbarus, barbarian. The plant is indigenous on the banks of the Volga.] The common name of plants of the genus Rheum (see RHEUM), which yield the leaf-stalks used for making tarts, &c. The species, which are numerous, are large herbaceous plants, natives of central Asia, with strong, branching, almost fleshy roots, erect, thick branching stems, sometimes 6 or 8 feet high. The roots are medicinal; but those of different species seem to possess their medicinal properties in very different degrees. The best official rhubarb is the root of R. officinale, a species growing in south-eastern Tibet. A good deal of rhubarb reaches Europe through Russia, but formerly came through Turkey by way of Anatolia, hence its name of Russian or Turkey rhubarb. Other species are Rheum undulatum, or Berberis rhubarb; R. Rhaponticum, or English rhubarb; R. Rhaponticum undulatum and compertum, or French rhubarb; R. palmatum, and R. Smolkei and Wobbenianum, or Himalayan rhubarb. Rhubarb is a valuable article in the materia medica, being an aperient, and at the same time a tonic and astringent. — Woods' rhubarb, Rheum alpinum and R. Patens. — Poor man's rhubarb, Thalictrum flavum.

Medicinal Rhubarb (Rheum officinale).

Rhubarb (rö'bärb'), a. Relating to rhubarb; like rhubarb.

Rhumb (rum), n. [From rhomb.] In nautic. (a) a line which makes any given angle with the meridian. (b) One of the thirty-two points of the compass. (c) A rhumb-line.

Rhumb-line (rum'lin), n. In nautic. a line described by the course of a ship, sailing steadily in any one direction except towards any of the cardinal points, same as Loxodromic Curve. See LOXODROMIC.

Rhus (rüz), n. [L. from Gr. rhōus, samech.] Sumach, a genus of deciduous trees and evergreen shrubs, nat. order Anacardiaceae. This genus is found in the south of Europe, in Africa, in Asia, and North and South America. They have usually compound leaves and panicles of small greenish-white or yellowish flowers. Most of the species are poisonous, but they are much cultivated as ornamental shrubs, on account of the beautiful red colour of their leaves in autumn. Many of them are used also for the purpose of dyeing and tanning, as an astringent principle, to which is frequently added an acid, is common to the whole genus. The juice of R. Toxicodendron (the poison-ivy or poison-oak) is extremely poisonous. R. Coriaria, or olive-leaved sumach, is extensively used for the purpose of tanning. R. vernicifera (the varnish-bearing sumach or Japan varnish-tree) yields a varnish used by the Japanese, and applied to furniture and almost everything made of wood. R. venusta (the poison sumach or swamp sumach), a native of North America, is exceedingly poisonous, so virulent that it is said to affect some persons by merely smelling it.

Rhizoma (rüz'ma), n. In botany, a mixture of canalic lime and opium or terpenoid of arsenic, used in depletion or unhairing of hides. B. H. Knight.

Rhyme (rim), n. [O.E. ryme, ryme, rym, from A. Sax. rim, gryme, number, rhyme; Icel. rim, composition, rhyme, rima, a rhyme, a ballad. D. rym, Dan. rim, G. rym, rhyme. The Romance forms, Fr. ryme, Pr. rym, ryma, rhyme, a poem. Sp. and Pg. ryma, are no doubt from the Teutonic, and not from L. rhymosus, Gr. rhymosus, rhythm. The latter word has, however, affected the spelling of rhyme, which would be more correctly written ryme, as in Old English and by some modern writers. The spelling rhyme or rhyma (with A inserted from ignorance) is not older than A.D. 1550. Shedd.] 1. A correspondence of sound in the final portions of two or more syllables, more especially the correspondence in sound of the terminating word or syllable of one line of poetry with the terminating word or syllable of another. To constitute this correspondence in single words or in syllables it is necessary that the word and the final component sound (if any) should be the same, or have nearly the same sound, the initial components being different, as in find and wind, name and drive, seize and lease. — Male or masculine rhymes, rhymes in which only the final syllables agree, as, strain, complain. — Feminine or feminine rhymes, rhymes in which the two final syllables agree, the first being accented, as, motion, poison. — 2. An expression of thought in verse; poetry, metre; also, a composition in verse, a poem, especially a short one. 'Things unattempted yet in prose or verse.' Milton. 'Read me rhymes elaborately good.' Tennyson. 'When you sang me that sweet rhyme.' Tennyson.

He knew himself to sing, and build the lofty rhyme. Milton.

3. A verse or line rhyming with another; as, to string rhymes together. — 4. A word answering in sound to another word.

Is thy ambition sweating for a rhyme, / Then unambitious foot, at this late time! Young.

— Rhyme and reason, number and sense. [The alliterative collocation of these words is old, and rhyme here seems to retain, in many instances at any rate, its original meaning of number.]

But are you so much in love as your rhymes speak? / Neither rhyme nor reason can express how much. Shaks.

For rhyme with reason may dispense, / And sound has right to govern sense. Prior.

— To act without rhyme or reason, to not recklessly, or without due thought and consideration.

Rhyme (rim), v. t. pret. & pp. rhymed; pp. rhyming. 1. To accord in the terminational sounds.

But forgotten his notions as they fell, / And if they rhymed and rattled, all was well. Dryden.

2. To make verses. There march'd of the hand and blackhead side by side, / Who rhyme for hire, and peddled for pride. Pope.

Rhyme (rim), v. t. 1. To put into rhyme, as, to rhyme a story. — 2. To bring into a certain condition by rhyming, to influence by rhyme. 'Follows of infinite tongue, that can rhyme themselves into ladies' favour.' Shaks.

Rhymaleus (rim'lee), a. Destitute of rhyme; not having consonance of sound. 'And doth beside on rhymaleus numbers tread.' Sp. Hall.

Rhymer (rim'er), n. One who makes rhymes; a versifier; a poor poet.

Rhymer, come on, and do the worst you can; / I fear not you, nor yet a better man. Dryden.

Rhyme-royal (rim'roi-al), n. A name formerly given to the stanza of seven lines of ten syllable verse, in which the first and third lines rhyme, the second, fourth, and fifth, and the sixth and seventh. The following stanza from Backville's Induction to Marston for Magnificence is an example.

'And first, within the porch and jaws of hell, / Sat deep Remorse of Conscience, all beset With tears, and to herself oft would she tell Her wretchedness, and, cursing, never stent To sob and sigh, but ever thus lament: With thoughtful care, as she that, all in vain, Would wear and waste continually in pain.'

Rhymery (rim'er-i), n. The art of making rhymes. Boile. Rev. [Rare.]

Rhymic (rim'ik), a. Pertaining to rhyme. [Rare.]

Rhymeter, Rhymist (rim'etär, rim'ist), n. A rhymist, a poor or mean poet.

Rhynchoccephalia (rin'ko-sä-fä'-ä), n. pl. [Gr. rhynchos, a snout, and kephala, head.] A group of lizards comprising only the genus Sphenodon (which see).

Rhynchoceti (rin'ko-sä'ti), n. pl. [Gr. rhynchos, a snout, and ketos, a whale.] A family of cetaceans allied to the cachalots or sperm-whales. They are distinguished by the possession of a pointed snout, single blow-hole, small dorsal fin, and dentition. The most important living genera are Hyperoodon and Ziphius, of which the former is found in the North Atlantic, and the latter in the Mediterranean and South Atlantic.

Rhyncholite (rin'kol-it), n. [Gr. rhynchos, a snout, and lithos, a stone.] The fossil mandible of a cephalopod.

Rhynchonella (rin'ko-nel'ä), n. [A dim. from Gr. rhynchos, a snout.] A little beak. A genus of brachiopodous mollusca, characterized by a trigonal, acutely-beaked shell. No fewer than 250 fossil species are numbered from the lower Silurian upward, but only two or three living species are known, in-position and impart stability to the structure. (b) A square timber of the ship fastened lengthwise in the bilgeways to prevent the timbers of the cradle slipping outwards during launching.

Ribband-line (rib'band-lin), n. In ship-building, one of the diagonal lines on the body-plan, by means of which the points called surmarins, where the respective bevelings are to be applied to the timbers, are marked off upon the mould.

Ribband-nail (rib'band-nail), n. In ship-building, a nail having a large round head with a ring to prevent the head from splitting the timber or being drawn through; used chiefly for fastening ribbands. Written also Ribbing-nail.

Ribbed (rib'ed), p. and a. Furnished with ribs, as, ribbed with steel; inclosed as with ribs, marked or formed with rising lines and channels; as, ribbed cloth.

And thou art long, and lush, and brown,
As is the ribbed sea-board.

Ribbing (rib'ing), n. 1. An assemblage or arrangement of ribs, as the timber work sustaining a vaulted ceiling, ridges on cloth, veins in the leaves of plants, &c. — 2. In agri. a kind of imperfect ploughing, formerly common, by which stubble were formerly turned over, every alternate strip only being moved. By this method only half the land is raised; the furrow being laid over quite flat, and covering an equal space of the level surface. A similar operation is still in use in some places, after land has been pulverized by clean ploughing and is ready for receiving the seed, and the mode of sowing upon land thus prepared is also called ribbing.

Ribbing-nail (rib'ing-nail), n. See RIBBAND-NAIL.

Ribble-rabble (rib'7-rahb'l), n. (Reduplication of rabble.) 1. A rabble; a mob. "A ribble-rabble of gumps." John Taylor. — 2. Silly or indecent talk. "Such uncouth wretched ribble-rabble." Hudibras Redivivus.

Ribble-row (rib'7-rô), n. 1. A list, a catalogue.

This which a ribble-row resembles,
Of scurvy names in scurvy verse.

Ribbon, Riband (rib'on, rib'and), n. [O E ribben, ribben, riband, &c., from O and Prov. Fr. riban, Mod. Fr. riban, a word probably of Germanic origin, being derived, according to Diem, from D. riug band, a necktie, lit. a ring-band; riug, from riug, being also seen in one of two other French words. Others take it from D. riig, G. riig, a row, a line, and band. Or perhaps the French word is from the Celtic comp. Gael. ribben, a ribbon, a fillet for the hair; rib, a hair; rib, a ribbon, a ribbon. W. ribb, what is thinly laid in a row or strand; ribbin, a narrow row, a streak; Armor. ribben, an alley, a passage between two walls.] 1. A fillet of silk, satin, &c. a narrow web of silk, satin, or other material, generally used for an ornament, or for fastening some part of female dress. The terms blue ribbon and red ribbon are often used to designate the orders of the Garter and Bath respectively, the badge of the former being supported by a blue ribbon, and that of the latter by a red ribbon. See BLUE-RIBBON.

Who but a woman, enriched her favourite ornament with four changes of colours, as ribbon, ribbon, ribbon, ribbon? Carroll's Mag.

2. What resembles a ribbon in some respects, a narrow, thin strip of anything, as, (a) in metal working, a long, thin strip of metal, such as a watch-spring, a thin steel band for a belt, or an endless saw, a thin band of magnetism for burning a tape-line, &c. (b) A continuous strand of cotton or other fibre in a loose, untwisted condition, as silver. (c) A thread, as, sails torn to ribbons. (d) pl. Carriage reins.

[Coll.] To ribben the ribbons, to drive. (e) In her one of the ordinaries, containing one-eighth part of the bend of which it is a diminutive, as, in the figure, a band between a ribbon in chief and a bendlet in base. Written also Riband, Ribben.

Ribbon.

Ribbon (rib'on), v. t. To adorn with ribbons, to furnish with ribbons or stripes resembling ribbons.

Each rib ribbon'd timburlane Flung on the mountain and
With a lovely frighten'd noise
Came about the youthful god. Met. Astruc.

Ribbon (rib'on), n. Of or pertaining to Ribbon.

Ribbon-brake (rib'on-brak), n. A brake having a band which nearly surrounds the wheel whose motion is to be checked.

Ribbon-fish (rib'on-fish), n. The popular name of the fishes of the genus Cepola, scaphocephaloid fishes belonging to the Cepolidae family and order Teleostei. The peculiar characters of the genus are indicated by the name, the species being distinguished by their lengthened bodies, much flattened at the sides, and their small scales.

Ribbon-grass (rib'on-gras), n. Canary-grass, a garden variety, striped with green and white, of Phalaris arundinacea, a grass which is found in its wild state by the sides of rivers. Called also Gardener's Garter.

Ribbonism (rib'on-izm), n. The principles of a secret association of Irishmen, which had its origin about 1860. The primary object of the association was antagonism to the Orange organization of the northern Protestants, to which was added the retaliation of agrarian oppression or injustice, real or supposed, by the assassination of landlords, land-agents, &c. The members were bound to each other by an oath, and had pass-words, signs, &c. They had their name from a piece of ribbon they wore as a badge. Each local association was called a ledge.

Ribbon-jasper (rib'on-jas-per), n. A name given to those varieties of jasper in which the colours are arranged in parallel layers or stripes, like ribbons. It is a product of argillaceous strata metamorphosed by contact with hot igneous rocks.

Ribbon-ledge (rib'on-ledge), n. An assembly of Ribbonmen or their place of meeting.

Ribbonman (rib'on-man), n. A member of an Irish Ribbon association or ledge. See RIBBONISM.

Ribbon-map (rib'on-map), n. A map printed on a long strip which winds on an axis within a case.

Ribbon-saw (rib'on-saw), n. Same as Saw-sash.

Ribbon-worm (rib'on-worm), n. A name given to individuals of the Nemertidae (which see).

Ribes (rib'es), n. (From Ribes a name given by the Arabian physicians of the eleventh and twelfth centuries to a species of rubus, and erroneously supposed to apply to our currant plants.) A genus of plants forming the nat. order Grossularaceae (which see). It is well known as producing the currant and gooseberry, and also for affording many of the ornamental shrubs of our gardens. The species are natives of the mountains, hills, woods, and thickets of the temperate parts of Europe, Asia, and America.

Rib-grass, Ribwort (rib'gras, rib'wert), n. A British plant of the genus Plantago, the P. lanceolata. See PLANTAGINACEAE.

Ribinet (rib'it), n. 1. A musical instrument; a rebo. Chewer. See REBO. — 2. [Comp. rib'ed.] An old hawk.

Or some good ribbe about Kenneth town
Or Kenneth, you would hang now for a witch.

Riblike, n. A small ribbe or rebo. Chewer.

Ribless (rib'les), n. Having no ribs.

Ribon (rib'on), n. Same as Ribben.

Ribroast (rib'rôst), v. t. To roast soundly; a barbaque word.

But I'd ribroast thee and bumst thee still
With my curried nose, and angry quill.

Ribston-pippin (rib'ston-pip-in), n. (From Ribston, in Yorkshire, where Sir Henry Goodricke planted three pips obtained from Bouen in Normandy. Two died, but one survived to become the parent of all the Ribston apples in England. Brewer.) A fine variety of apple.

Rib-supported (rib'sup-ported), n. Supported or sustained by ribs.

Rib-vaulting (rib-val'ting), n. Is arch-vaulting having ribs projecting below the general surface of the ceiling to strengthen and ornament it.

Ribwort (rib'wert). See RIB-GRASS.

Ric, a termination denoting jurisdiction, or a district over which government is exercised, as in biocarpus, A. Sax. cyne-ric, king-ric. It is the A. Sax. ric, power, dominion, kingdom, realm, G. reich, D. reich, Goth. rihri, dominion, from the same root as E. right, rich, I. rige, to rule, whence regal, regnum, &c. As a termination of proper names it denotes rich or powerful, as in Frederick, rich in power.

Ricaceae (rik'-a-sé-sé), n. pl. [In honour of F. Francisco Riccio, a Florentine botanist.] A nat. order of Liverworts, or Hepaticae, consisting of delicate, green, membranous fronds, spreading on the ground or floating in water. The fruits are always sessile on the frond, more or less embedded in its substance according to the thickness; the spores are unaccompanied by elaters. They are mostly natives of warm climates.

Rice (ris), n. [Fr. ris or ris, from L. oryza, from Gr. oryza, oryzon, rice, from A. r. rus, rise in the husk.] A plant of the genus Oryza and its seed. (See ORYZA.) There is only one important species, O. sativa. The plant is probably originally a native of India, but it is now cultivated in all warm climates, and the grain forms a large portion of the food of the inhabitants. In America it grows chiefly on low moist land, which can be overflowed. It is a light and nutritious food, and very easy of digestion. Rice is an annual, erect, simple, round, and jointed, from 1 to 6 feet high, the leaves are large, firm, and pointed, arising from very long, cylindrical, and finely striated sheaths; the flowers are disposed in a panicle somewhat resembling that of the oats, the seeds are white and oblong, but vary in size and form in the numerous varieties. There is an immense variety in the qualities of rice, but the rice raised on the low marshy grounds of Carolina is unquestionably very superior to any brought from any other quarter. Of the rice imported from the East that from Patna is the most esteemed. Canada rice, or the wild rice of North America, is the Eleusine aquatica, quite different from the true rice. The seeds are farinaceous, and much used for food by the Indians.

Rice-bird (ris'berd), n. 1. A bird of the United States, the Zonotrichia erythron, or Delichonys erythron, an named from its feeding on rice. In New England it is called bobolink or bob-linkin. Called also Rice-bunting or Rice-trooplet. See BOBOLINK. — 2. One of the names of the paddy-bird or

In New England it is called bobolink or bob-linkin. Called also Rice-bunting or Rice-trooplet. See BOBOLINK. — 2. One of the names of the paddy-bird or Rice-bird (Lanius erythron).

Java sparrow, the Lanius erythron. In Java and other parts of Asia where it is found it commits great ravages in the rice fields with its sharp and powerful bill. It is admired for its elegant shape and colouring.

Rice-blancet (ris'bis-bet), n. A blancet made with flour, with a greater or less portion of rice mixed, sweetened with sugar, and flavoured and enriched with butter, currants, &c.

Rice-bunting (ris'bunt-ing), n. Same as Rice-bird.

Rice-dust (ris'dust), n. The refuse of rice which remains when it is cleaned for the market, consisting of the husk, broken grains, and dust; rice-meal. It is a valuable food for cattle.

Rice-flour (ris'flour), n. Ground rice for making puddings, &c.

Rice-glue (ris'glo), n. A species of glue made by boiling ground rice in soft water to the consistence of thin jelly.

Rice-meal (ris'mel), n. Same as Rice-dust.

Rice-milk (ris'milk), n. Milk boiled and thickened with rice.

Rice-paper (ris'pêr), n. 1. Paper made from rice straw, used in Japan and elsewhere. — 2. A substance prepared from the central cellular portion or pith of the stem of Ardisia papyrifera. The stem of the plant is cut into lengths and the woody part removed. The pith is then, by means ber, constituting the ridge of a roof, into which the rafters are fastened. Called also Ridge-pole or Ridge-pole.

even while attached to the branches, and also for the numerous adventitious root-like projections which serve as supports for the stem. The wood of several species is hard and durable, and the bark astringent. The Rhodante (rô-dan'tê), a. [Gr rhodon, a rose, and antêos a flower] A beautiful genus of Compositæ found in Western Australia. The only species is R. Mongoides, of which there are several varieties, differing from each other mainly in the size and colour of the flower heads, which have the dry character of what are commonly called 'everlastings'. It is an annual, rising from 1 to 1½ foot high, with an erect branching stem, oblong blunt entire stem clasping leaves of a glaucous green colour, and flower heads, varying from pale rose to deep purple, supported on stalks arranged in a corymbose manner.

Rhodes-wood (rôd's-wôd), a. The wood of the West Indian tree Amyris balsamifera. Called also Cardamum.

Rhodian (rô'di-an), a. Pertaining to Rhodes, an island in the Mediterranean, or Rhodian law, the earliest system of marine law known to history, said to be compiled by the Rhodians after they had by their commerce and naval victories obtained the sovereignty of the sea, about 800 B.C.

Rhodian (rô'di-an), a. A native or inhabitant of Rhodes.

Rhodo-chloride (rô'di-ô-khlo-rîd), a. In chem. a double chloride of rhodium and the alkali metals.

Rhodola (rô-dô-lâ), a. A genus of alpine plants belonging to the nat. order Crassulacæ. The R. rosea, now frequently called Sedum Rhodola or rose-root, is a British plant found on cliffs along the sea and on high mountains. It is very common in the Highlands of Scotland and the Hebrides. The root, which is thick and fleshy, smells like a rose. The leaves are glaucous, sessile, and alternate, and the yellow or purplish flowers are in compact corymbose cymes. It is found throughout Western Europe, including the Arctic regions, the Himalayas, and east and west North America.

Rhodium (rô'di-um), a. [Gr rhodon, a rose, on account of the red colour of some of its salts, especially of the chloride, when dissolved in water; Sym. Rh. at. wt. 104.2] A metal discovered in the beginning of the present century by Wollaston, associated with palladium in the ore of platinum. Rhodium is very infusible, scarcely softening in the flame of the oxyhydrogen blow-pipe. When fused it has a white colour and a metallic lustre. It is grayish-white in colour, extremely hard, brittle, and has a sp. gr. of 12.1. It unites with oxygen at a red heat, a mixture of peroxide and protoxide being formed. When pure it is not acted upon by any acid, but if in the state of an alloy it is dissolved by aqua regia. It has been used for the points of metallic pens.

Rhodocentrite (rô-dok'ên-trî-tî), a. [See RHODOCENTRITES] In palmæ a rose-centrite.

Rhodourinus (rô-dô-ur'î-nus), a. [Gr rhodon, a rose, and urinos, a fly] A genus of palmaridæ centrites with a round and sometimes slightly pentagonal column, formed of numerous joints, and perforated by a pentagonal alimentary canal, the rose-centrites.

Rhododendron (rô-dô-dên'drôn), a. [Gr rhododendron, an oleander or a rhododendron, its tree-tree—rhodon, a rose, and dendron, a tree] A genus of highly-primed survivors. They are nearly related to one another, and occur both in the New and Old Worlds. The varieties cultivated in the country belong chiefly to R. ponticum, a native of the coast of the Black Sea, or to R. azarum, an American species, or to hybrids between these two. The leaves of R. azarum, a Siberian species with yellow flowers, possess narcotic properties, and have a good reputation as a remedy in chronic rheumatism. Some of the most ornamental species are natives of the Himalayas. R. ferrugineum, found wild in Switzerland, is called the rose of the Alps.

Rhodomela (rô-dô-mê-lâ), a. pl. [Gr rhodon, a rose, and mêla, an apple, a fruit] An order of Scitoidæ or Rhodospærmæ algae, consisting of red or brown sea-weeds with a leafy or filiform, articulated or articulated frond composed of polygonal cells. There are several British species.

Rhodometade (rô'dô-met-âd), a. Etruscan spelling of Rodemotade.

Rhodonite (rô'don-î), a. [Gr rhodon, a rose] A mineral consisting chiefly of magnesian silicate, mixed with silicate of iron, calcium, &c.

Rhodospærmæ (rô-dô-spêr'mâ-s), a. pl. [Gr rhodon, a rose, and spêrmæ, seed] One of the three divisions into which Agassiz has divided the two orders being the Melanosperma and Chlorosperma. The species with one or two exceptions, are marine, and are distinguished for their brilliant permanent tints of a very-red or purple colour, and the collection of their spores into sort, or if scattered, by the spores being arranged on a ternary plan. The division comprises the orders Rhodospærmæ, Laurencinæ, Corallinæ, Dolomieuæ, Rhodomytilinæ, Cryptocladinæ, and Ceramium. Called also Floridanæ.

Rhodospore (rô-dô-spôr-â-s), a. pl. Same as Rhodospærmæ.

Rhodostereite (rô'dô-stêr-ê-tî), a. [Gr rhodon, a rose, and stêrê, a crust] A crucian. S. Jenseni.

Rhodymenia (rô'di-mê-nî-â), a. [Gr rhodon, a rose, and Agmæ a membrane] The typical genus of the nat. order rose-sperma alga Rhodymenaceæ. S. palmata is the well known dulce of our sea-coasts.

Rhodymeninæ (rô'di-mê-nî-â-s), a. pl. An order of Floridanæ sea-weeds of purple or blood-red colour. The root is dark like or branched, much flattened, the frond, which is composed of polygonal cells, is either leafy or filiform, and much branched, never articulate. The species are widely dispersed. Rhodymenia palmata, or dulce, is a well known example. Many of the species of the genus Gracilaria are largely used in the East as ingredients in soups, jellies, &c., and as substitutes for ginseng. One of them is the agar-agar of the Chinese.

Rhomb (rom), a. [Fr rhombe, L. rhombus from Gr rhombos] A lozenge, a rhombus, an oblique angled equilateral parallelogram, or a quadrilateral figure whose sides are equal, and the opposite sides parallel, but the angles unequal, one of the angles being obtuse and two acute. 2. In crystal, a solid bounded by six equal and similar rhombic planes, a rhombodrum. Prism's rhomb, a rhomb of crystals, so cut that a ray of light entering one of its faces at right angles shall emerge at right angles at the opposite face, after undergoing within the rhomb, at its other faces, two total reflections. It is used to produce a ray circularly polarized, which again becomes plain-polarized on being transmitted through a second Prism's rhomb.

Rhomboid (rom'boîd), a. Having the figure of a rhomb.

Rhomboidal (rom-bô'id-êl), a. [See RHOMBUS] 1. In geom. relating to a rhomboid, having forms derived from the rhomboid. 2. In crystal relating to a system of forms known by the pressure of four axes, three of which are in the same plane and inclined to each other at an angle of 60° whilst the remaining fourth one is perpendicular to the three, as in the regular six-sided prism and the rhombodrum.

Rhombodrum (rom-bô'id-drum), a. [Gr rhombos, a rhomb, and dêron, a side] In geom. and crystal a solid bounded by six rhombic planes, a rhomb.

Rhomboid (rom'boîd), a. [Gr rhombos, rhomb, and oîd, form] 1. In geom. a bark of R. gymnantha is used in India for dyeing black. The species are natives of the tropics, where they root in the mud, and form a dense thicket down to the verge of the water.

Mangrove (Rhizophora Mangle).

Rhizophoraceæ (rî-sôf-ô-râ-sâ-s), a. pl. The mangroves a natural order of trees of which the genus Rhizophora is the type. See RHIZOPHORA.

Rhizophorous (rî-sôf-ô-rus), a. In bot. root-bearing, belonging to the natural order Rhizophoraceæ.

Rhipod (rîp'ôd), a. A member of the order Rhipodæ.

Rhipodæ (rîp'ô-dâ), a. pl. [Gr rhîp, a root, and podos, a foot] The lowest class of the Protzoa, comprehending those members which are destitute of a mouth, are single or compound, and possess the power of emitting pseudopodia. They are mostly minute, frequently microscopic, but some (such as the sponges) attain considerable size. Structurally the rhipodæ consist of a mass of sarcodæ, destitute of organs for digestion, &c. The characteristic from which they have their name is their capability of protruding processes (pseudopodia) from any part of their substance, sometimes as filaments or threads and sometimes finger-shaped, and retracting them at pleasure. The Amœbæ (which see) may be regarded as a typical rhipodæ. Some, as the Foraminifera, are invested with a calcareous shell, sometimes consisting of one coil, but generally of an aggregation of minute chambers or cells, through the pores of which they protrude their fine like processes. The class has been divided into five orders—Amœbæ, Actinobæ, Foraminifera, Radiolaria, and Spongia, of which the last is occasionally considered a separate class. See separate entries.

Rhisorhoma (rî-sôr'ô-mâ), a. [Gr rhîs, a root, and stoma, a mouth] A genus of crustaceate animals belonging to the order Lacernaria. These animals resemble huge jelly fishes, and may attain a diameter of 1 foot or more. They are chiefly met with in tropical seas, and possess powerful stinging cells. R. Cuvieri is a familiar species. The Rhisorhoma have their sense-organs covered by a 'hood,' and hence are 'hood-eyed' Medusæ.

Rhisorhoma (rî-sôr'ô-mâ), a. A hydrosoma of the section Discophora and order Lacernaria.

Rhisorhoma (rî-sôr'ô-mâ), a. pl. [Gr rhîs, a root, and stoma, a mouth] A family of Hydrosoma of the order Lacernaria, in which reproductive elements are developed in free zooids, produced by fission, the umbrella or disc of the generative zooids is without marginal tentacles, and the polypites are numerous, modified, and depending on a dendroid or tree-shaped mass from the umbrella. The genus Rhisorhoma is the type. See RHIZOPHORA.

Rhizotaxis (rî-sô-tâ-sis), a. [Gr rhîs, a root, and taxis, arrangement] In bot. the arrangement of the roots.

Rhodolite, Rhodolite (rô'dô-lî-tî), a. [Gr rhodon, a rose, and lîta, a stone, salt.] Red or cobalt vitriol, sulphate of cobalt.

quadrilateral figure whose opposite sides and angles are equal, but which is neither equilateral nor equiangular. — 2. In crystallography, a solid having a rhomboidal form with three axes of unequal lengths, two of which are at right angles to each other, whilst the third is so inclined as to be perpendicular to one of the two axes, and oblique to the other.

Rhomboid (rom'boid), a. Rhomboid-shaped; rhomboidal, specifically, (a) in anat. applied to a thin, broad, and obliquely square fleshy muscle between the base of the scapula and the spine dorsal. (b) In bot. applied to a diamond-shaped leaf: called also a rhomboid leaf.

Rhomboidal (rom-boid'al), a. Having the shape of a rhomboid, or a shape approaching it.

A rhomb of Iceland spar, a solid bounded by six equal and similar rhomboidal surfaces. Brewster.

Rhomboides (rom-boid'ides), a. A rhomboid. 'A geometrical rhomboides.' Milton. [Rare.]

Rhomboid-ovate (rom-boid-ō'vāt), a. Between rhomboid and oval in shape; partly rhomboid, partly oval.

Rhomb-spar (rom'spär), a. A mineral of a grayish white, occurring massive, disseminated and crystallized in rhomboids, imbedded in chlorite slate, limestone, &c. It consists chiefly of carbonates of lime and magnesia.

Rhombus (rom'būs), n. 1. In geom. same as Rhomb. — 2. A genus of fishes comprising the turbot, brill, and some others of less importance: so named for their rhomboidal form.

Rhombal (rom'bäl), a. Relating or pertaining to rhombus; as, rhombal fluctuation. Dupleton.

Rhombicant (rom'bik-ō-nant), a. [L. rhombus, a rattle, a snore, and sonans, sonant, ppr. of sono, to sound.] Snoring. [Rare.]

Rhombus (rom'būs), n. [L., from Gr rhombos, a snoring sound.] In med. the same as Rattis or Rale; also the deep snoring which accompanies inspiration in some diseases, particularly in apoplexy, stertor.

Rhomb (rōm), n. [Scott.] A rain-water pipe. See Rong.

Rhomboid (rōm-boid), n. Same as Rhomboid.

Rhopale (rō-pāl'ik), a. [Gr rhōpaleon, a club which from the handle to the top grows bigger and bigger.] In pres. applied to a line in which each succeeding word contains a syllable more than that preceding it. 'Hope ever solaces miserable individuals' is an example.

Rhopalocera (rō-pāl-ōc'ē-ā), n. pl. [Gr rhōpaleon, a club, and keras, a horn.] That section of lepidopterous insects which comprises the diurnal Lepidoptera, or butterflies, distinguished by the vertical position of the wings during repose (the moths having them horizontal), and by their having the antennae slender and terminated by a small club (whence the name).

Rhopalodon (rō-pāl-ō-don), a. [Gr rhōpaleon, a club, and odon, odon, a tooth.] Litt. club-tooth. The name given to a fossil genus of reptiles from the Permian of Russia, apparently related to the lizards from the Permian of Bristol. The name is from the shape of the teeth, which with some fragments of the jaw constitute all the remains that have been found.

Rhopalocerus (rō-pāl-ōc'ē-ā), n. Same as Rhopalocera.

Rhubarb (rō'hārb), n. [Fr. rhubarbe, It. rebarbano, rebarbano, from L. rhus barbarum, Gr. rhus barbarum; said to be from Rha, a name of the river Volga, and barbarum, barbarian. The plant is indigenous on the banks of the Volga.] The common name of plants of the genus Rheum (see RHEUM), which yield the leaf-stalks used for making tarts, &c. The species, which are numerous, are large herbaceous plants, natives of central Asia, with strong, branching, almost fleshy roots, erect, thick branching stems, sometimes 6 or 8 feet high. The roots are medicinal; but those of different species seem to possess their medicinal properties in very different degrees. The best official rhubarb is the root of R. officinale, a species growing in south-eastern Tibet. A good deal of rhubarb reaches Europe through Russia, but formerly came through Turkey by way of Anatolia, hence its name of Russian or Turkey rhubarb. Other species are Rheum undulatum, or Bucharian rhubarb; R. Rhaponticum, or English rhubarb; R. Rhaponticum undulatum and compactum, or French rhubarb; R. palmatum, and R. Smoed and Webbianum, or Himalayan rhubarb. Rhubarb is a valuable article in the materia medica, being an aperient, and at the same time a tonic and astringent. — Mont's rhubarb, Rheum alpinum and R. Patensis. — Poor man's rhubarb, Thalictrum flavum.

Medicinal Rhubarb (Rheum officinale).

Rhubarby (rō'hārb-lī), a. Relating to rhubarb, like rhubarb.

Rhumb (rum), n. [From rhomb.] In navig. (a) a line which makes any given angle with the meridian. (b) One of the thirty-two points of the compass. (c) A rhumb-line.

Rhumb-line (rum'tin), n. In navig. a line described by the course of a ship, sailing steadily in any one direction except towards any of the cardinal points; same as Loxodromic Curve. See LOXODROMIC.

Rhus (rūs), n. [L., from Gr rhōs, sumach.] Sumach, a genus of deciduous trees and evergreen shrubs, nat. order Anacardiaceae. This genus is found in the south of Europe, in Africa, in Asia, and North and South America. They have usually compound leaves and panicles of small greenish-white or yellowish flowers. Most of the species are poisonous, but they are much cultivated as ornamental shrubs, on account of the beautiful red colour of their leaves in autumn. Many of them are used also for the purposes of dyeing and tanning, as an astringent principle, to which is frequently added an acid, is common to the whole genus. The juice of R. Toxicodendron (the poison-ivy or poison-oak) is extremely poisonous. R. Coriaria, or elm-leaved sumach, is extensively used for the purpose of tanning. R. vernicefera (the varnish-bearing sumach or Japan varnish-tree) yields a varnish used by the Japanese, and applied to furniture and almost everything made of wood. R. venenata (the poison sumach or swamp sumach), a native of North America, is exceedingly poisonous; so virulent that it is said to affect some persons by merely smelling it.

Rhusma (rūs'mā), n. In toxicology, a mixture of caustic lime and opium or ferriphosphate of arsenic, used in depilation or unhairing of hides. E. H. Knight.

Rhyme (rim), n. [O E. ryme, ryme, rym, from A. Sax. rim, perim, number, rhyme; Ital. rima, computation, rhyme, rima, a rhyme, a ballad, D. rijm, Dan. rijm, G. reim, rhyme. The Romance forms, Fr. ryme, Fr. ryme, ryme, rhyme, a poem. Sp. and Pg. ryma, are no doubt from the Teutonic, and not from L. rhymus, Gr. rhymos, rhythm. The latter word has, however, affected the spelling of rhyme, which would be more correctly written ryme, as in Old English and by some modern writers. 'The spelling rhyme or ryme (with a inserted from ignorance) is not older than A. D. 1560.' Street.] 1. A correspondence of sound in the final portions of two or more syllables, more especially the correspondence in sound of the terminating word or syllable of one line of poetry with the terminating word or syllable of another. To constitute this correspondence in single words or in syllables it is necessary that the vowel and the final consonantal sound (if any) should be the same, or have nearly the same sound, the initial consonants being different, as in find and wind, new and dear, came and lane. — Male or masculine rhyme, rhymes in which only the final syllables agree, as, strain, complains. — Female or feminine rhyme, rhymes in which the two final syllables agree, the first being accented, as, motion, poison. — 2. An expression of thought in verse, poetry; metre; also, a composition in verse, a poem, especially a short one. 'Things unattempted yet in prose or rime.' Milton. 'Read me rhymes elaborately good.' Tennyson. 'When you sang me that sweet rhyme.' Tennyson.

He knew Himself to sing, and build the lofty rhyme. Milton.

3. A verse or line rhyming with another; as, to string rhymes together. 4. A word answering in sound to another word.

In thy ambition sweating for a rhyme, Thou unambitious fool, at this late time? Young.

— Rhyme and reason, number and sense.

[The alliterative collocation of these words is old, and rhyme here seems to retain, in many instances at any rate, its original meaning of number.]

But are you so much in love as your rhymes speak? Neither Rhyme nor reason can express how much. Shad.

For rhyme with reason may dispense, And sound has right to govern sense. Prior.

— To act without rhyme or reason, to act recklessly, or without due thought and consideration.

Rhyme (rim), s. d. prot. & pp. rhymed; ppr. rhyming. 1. To accord in the terminational sounds.

But forgotten his notions as they fell, And if they rhymed and melted, all was well. Dryden.

2. To make verses.

There march'd the hard and blackhead side by side, Who rhymed for hire, and patronized for pride. Pope.

Rhyme (rim), s. d. 1. To put into rhyme; as, to rhyme a story. — 2. To bring into a certain condition by rhyming; to influence by rhyme. 'Fellows of infinite tongue, that can rhyme themselves into ladies' favours.' Shak.

Rhymeless (rim'less), a. Destitute of rhyme; not having consonance of sound. 'And doth beside on rhymeless numbers tread.' Sp. Hall.

Rhymer (rim'ēr), n. One who makes rhymes; a versifier; a poor poet.

Rhymer, come on, and do the worst you can; I fear not you, nor yet a better man. Dryden.

Rhyme-royal (rim'roi-āl), n. A name formerly given to the stanza of seven lines of ten-syllable verse, in which the first and third lines rhyme, the second, fourth, and fifth, and the sixth and seventh. The following stanza from Spenser's Induction to Morte Arthur is an example.

'And first, within the porch and jaws of hell, Sat deep Remorse of Conscience, all besmear'd With tears, and to herself oft would she tell Her wretchedness, and, cursing, never stent To sob and sigh, but ever thus lament. With thoughtful care, as she sat, all in vain, Would wear and waste continually in pain.'

Rhynchonella (rin'kol-ē-lā), n. pl. [Gr rhynchonella, a beak.] A family of brachiopods or bivalves, characterized by the possession of a powerful, single blow hole, small dorsal fin, and dentition. The most important living genera are Hyperodon and Zaphira, of which the former is found in the North Atlantic, and the latter in the Mediterranean and South Atlantic.

Rhyncholite (rin'kol-it), n. [Gr rhynchos, a beak, and lithos, a stone.] The fossil mandible of a cephalopod.

Rhynchonella (rin'kol-ē-lā), n. [A dim. from Gr rhynchos, a beak.] Litt. little-beak. A genus of brachiopods or bivalves, characterized by a trigonal, acutely-beaked shell. No fewer than 250 fossil species are numbered from the lower Silurian upward, but only two or three living species are known, in-position and impart stability to the structure. (b) A square timber of the ship fastened lengthwise in the bilgeways to prevent the timbers of the cradle slipping outwards during launching.

Ribband-line (rib'band-lin), n. In ship-building, one of the diagonal lines on the body-plan, by means of which the points called surmarke, where the respective bevelings are to be applied to the timbers, are marked off upon the mould.

Ribband-nail (rib'band-nail), n. In ship-building, a nail having a large round head with a ring to prevent the head from splitting the timber or being drawn through; used chiefly for fastening ribbands. Written also Ribbing nail.

Ribbed (rib'ed), p. and a. Furnished with ribs; as, ribbed with steel; inclosed as with ribs, marked or formed with rising lines and channels; as, ribbed cloth.

As these are long, and high, and brown.
As to the ribbed cloth.

Ribbing (rib'ing), n. 1. An assemblage or arrangement of ribs, as the timber work sustaining a vaulted ceiling, ridges on cloth, veins in the leaves of plants, &c. — 2. In agr., a kind of imperfect ploughing, formerly common, by which stubbles were rapidly turned over, every alternate strip only being moved. By this method only half the land is raised; the furrow being laid over quite flat, and covering an equal space of the level surface. A similar operation is still in use in some places, after land has been pulverized by clean ploughing and is ready for receiving the seed, and the mode of sowing upon land thus prepared is also called ribbing.

Ribbing-nail (rib'ing-nail), n. See RIBBAND-NAIL.

Ribble-rabble (rib'7-rah-l), n. [Reduplication of rabble.] 1. A rabble, a mob. "A ribble-rabble of gossip." John Taylor. — 2. Silly or indecent talk. "Such smooth wretched ribble-rabble." Editha Rediviva.

Ribble-row (rib'7-rô), n. A list; a catalogue.

This which a ribble-row rebueth, Cato.

Rice, A termination denoting jurisdiction, or a district over which government is exercised, as in Isle of Rye, Rye-ris, Rye-ris. It is the S. Sax. rice, power, dominion, kingdom, realm; G. reich, D. Reich, Goth. reiki, dominion; from the same root as E. right, rich, L. regis, to rule, whence regal, regium, &c. As a termination of proper names it denotes rich or powerful, as in Frederick, rich in peace.

Rice (rik'el, rik'el), n. pl. (In honour of F. Francisco Ricci, a Florentine botanist.) A nat. order of Liliaceae, or Hypericaceae, consisting of delicate, green, membranous fronds, spreading on the ground or floating in water. The fruits are always sessile on the frond, more or less embedded in its substance according to the thickness; the spores are unaccompanied by elaters. They are mostly natives of warm climates.

Rice (rik), n. [Fr. riz or ris, from L. oryza, from Gr. oryza, oryzom, rice, from Ar. rus, rice in the husk.] A plant of the genus Oryza and its seed. (See ORYZA.) There is only one important species, O. sativa. The plant is probably originally a native of India, but it is now cultivated in all warm climates, and the grain forms a large portion of the food of the inhabitants. In America it grows chiefly on low moist land, which can be overworked. It is a light and nutritious food, and very easy of digestion. Rice is an annual, erect, simple, round, and jointed, from 1 to 5 feet high, the leaves are large, firm, and pointed, arising from very long, cylindrical, and finely striated sheaths; the flowers are disposed in a panicle somewhat resembling that of the oats, the seeds are white and oblong, but vary in size and form in the numerous varieties. There is an immense variety in the qualities of rice, but the rice raised on the low marshy grounds of Carolina is unquestionably very superior to any brought from any other quarter. Of the rice imported from the East that from Patna is the most esteemed. Canada rice, or the wild rice of North America, is the Sizania aquatica, quite different from the true rice. The seeds are farinaceous, and much used for food by the Indians.

Rice-bird (rik'berd), n. 1. A bird of the United States, the Zonotrichia erythrorhynchos, or Delichonys erythrorhynchos, so named from its feeding on rice. In New England it is called bobolink or bob-linkin. Called also Rice-bunting or Rice-tropical. See BOBOLINK. — 2. One of the names of the paddy-bird or

Rice (Oryza sativa)

Rice-bird (Larus erythrorhynchos). In Java and other parts of Asia where it is found it commits great ravages in the rice fields with its sharp and powerful bill. It is admired for its elegant shape and colouring.

Rice-bunt (rik'bis-kat), n. A blight made with flour, with a greater or less portion of rice mixed, sweetened with sugar, and flavoured and enriched with butter, currants, &c.

Rice-bunting (rik'bunt-ing), n. Same as RICE-BIRD.

Richardia (rich-ar'di-a), n. [In honour of I. C. Richard, an eminent French botanist.] A genus of plants, nat. order Araceæ, of which only one species is known (R. cœli- opica), a native of the Cape of Good Hope. It is one of the most beautiful of ardisceous plants, with large, handsome, glossy leaves, and white spathe, growing vigorously in the ordinary apartments of a house, and may be made to blossom all the year round. It was introduced into this country under the name of Calla æthiopica, and is often known as the white arum, lily of the Nile, or trumpet lily.

Richard Roe. See JOHN DOE.

Richardsonia (rich-ard-sô-ni-a), n. [In memory of Richard Richardson, an English botanist.] A genus of plants, nat. order Rubiaceæ. The species are natives of America. They are trailing plants with woody roots covered with a thick rough rind, and small flowers clustered together in heads at the ends of the branches, and surrounded by an involucre. R. scabra (white ipeca-cuanha) inhabits tropical America, and possesses properties similar to those of Cephaelis Ipecacuanha.

Riches (rich'es), n. [Formerly richesse, from Fr. richesse, from riche, rich. See RICH.] 1. That which makes rich; an abundance of land, goods, or money; abundant possessions; wealth; opulence; affluence.

Riches do not consist in having more gold and silver, but in having more in proportion than our neighbours. Locke.

2. That which is or appears rich, precious, sumptuous, or the like. 'The riches of heaven's pavement, trodden gold.' Milton. This word, as may be inferred from the etymology, is really in the singular number, but is very rarely so used, the apparently plural termination having caused it to be regarded as a plural, and to be so used. It is a singular in the following examples.

And for that riches, where is my deserving? Shak. For in one hour so great riches is come to nought. Rev. xviii. 17.

Rifle (rif'), n. [A foreign name introduced with the foreign invention; lit. a grooved musket. Dan. rîfe, a groove or fluting. rîfe, to rise a gun, to groove a column. rîfel, a rifle; G. rîfeln, to channel, rîfe, a groove.] 1. A gun about the usual length and size of a musket, the inside of whose barrel is rified, that is, grooved, or formed with spiral channels. See Rifled arms under the following verb.—2. pl. A body of troops armed with rifles; as, the Cape mounted Rifles; the Canadian Rifles; &c.—3. A sort of whet stone or instrument for sharpening scythes. [Local.]

Rife (rif'), v.t. pret. & pp. rifed; ppr. rifing. 1. To groove; to channel. Rifed arms, firearms in which spiral grooves are cut in the surface of the bore. The groove is simply a portion of the thread of a female screw with a long pitch, the inclination being much less than one turn in the length of the bore. The object of rifing a gun is to give the projectile a rotation round an axis coincident with that of the bore, which insures greater accuracy of fire. If a spherical shot be used no other advantages follow; but if an elongated projectile be employed, not only is the accuracy increased, but longer range and more destructive force are obtained. Elongated projectiles, generally cylindrical in shape, with a conoidal head, have, therefore, entirely superseded spherical shot for rifled arms.—2. To whet, as a scythe, with a rifle. [Local.]

Rife-ball (rif'-bäl), n. A ball for firing with a rifle. Such balls are not now spherical as formerly, but generally cylindrical, with a conoidal head, the base being usually hollowed and fitted with a plug, which causes the bullet to expand into the grooves of the bore of the weapon. See Rifled arms under RIFLE, v.t.

Rife-bird (rif'-bêrd), n. An Australian bird (Ptiloris paradiseus), of the family Uropidae, with a long curved bill, found only in the very thick bush. It is about the size of a large pigeon. The plumage in the upper parts is velvety black tinged with purple, in the under parts velvety black, diversified with olive-green; the tail is black, the two central feathers rich metallic green; the crown of the head and throat are covered with lustrous emerald-green specks. The male is considered the most splendidly plumaged of Australian birds.

Rife-corps (rif'-kôr), n. 1. A body of soldiers armed with rifles.—2. A body of volunteers trained to the use of the rifle.

Rifeman (rif'-man), n. A man armed with a rifle; specifically, one of a body of troops armed with rifles, and formerly more or less employed as sharpshooters. The name has now lost nearly all its meaning, as the whole infantry are now provided with rifles; but previous to 1854 the rifemen were quite the exception, the army, with the exception of two regiments, the 60th and the 95th, having the smooth-bore musket.

Rife-pit (rif'-pit), n. A pit or short trench in front of an army, fort, &c., generally about 4 feet long and 3 feet deep, with the earth thrown up in front so as to afford cover to two skirmishers. Sometimes they are loopholed by laying a sand-bag over two other bags on the top of the breastwork so that the head and shoulders of the rifeman are covered.

Riffer (rif'-er), n. One that rifles; one that pillages; a robber. Milton.

Rift (rift), n. (From rise; Dan. rift, a rift, rent, fissure.) A cleft; a fissure; an opening made by riving or splitting. 'Should solder up the rift.' Shak.

His head through the blackened rifts
Of the crags that keep him down. Longfellow.

Rift (rift), v.t. To cleave; to rive; to split; as, to rift an oak or a rock. 'And rifted Jove's stout oak.' Shak.

Mother-age (for mine I know not) help me as when Life began:
Rift the hills, and roll the waters, flash the lightnings, weigh the sun. Tennyson.

Rift (rift), v.i. 1. To burst open; to split. Timber . . . not apt to rift with ordnance. Bacon.

2. To belch. [Scotch.]

Rift (rift), n. (Comp. D. rf, a shallow place in the sea, a reef. See REEF.) A shallow place in a stream; a fording place. [Local.]

Rig (rig), n. [Scotch.] [See RIDGE.] 1. A ridge of land; a strip of land between two furrows.

May Boners never thresh your rigs,
Nor kick your rickles off their legs. Burns.

2. The back of an animal. — 3. A course; a path or way.

Rig (rig), v.t. pret. & pp. rigged; ppr. rigging. (Origin doubtful; perhaps originally to put on the back, from old rig, A. Sax. Arýg, the back.) 1. To dress; to put on; to clothe; generally followed by out, and used only colloquially or when the dress is of a gay, fanciful, or odd description.

Jack was rigged out in his gold and silver lace, with a feather in his cap. Sir R. L'Étranger.

2. To furnish with apparatus or gear; to fit with tackling; as, to rig a purchase. — 3. To supply with rigging; to fit, as the shrouds, stays, braces, &c., to their respective masts and yards. — To rig out a boom, to run out a pole upon the end of a yard or bowsprit to extend the foot of a sail. — To rig in a boom, to draw it in from its situation upon the end of a yard or bowsprit, &c. — To rig the market, to raise or lower prices artificially in order to one's private advantage; especially, in the stock exchange, to enhance fictitiously the value of the stock or shares in a company, as when the directors or officers buy them up out of the funds of the association. The market is also sometimes rigged by a combination of parties, as large shareholders, interested in raising the value of the stock.

Rig (rig), n. [See the verb.] 1. Dress; usually, gay or fanciful dress. — 2. Naut. the peculiar manner of fitting the masts and rigging to the hull of any vessel; thus, schooner-rig, ship-rig, &c., imply the masts and sails of those vessels without regard to the hull.

Rig (rig), n. (Origin doubtful; Wedgwood compares Manx reagh, rattling, wanton, rig-gan, to rut.) 1. A romp; a wanton; a strumpet. 'Fy on thee, thou rampe, thou rig.' Bp. Still. — 2. A ridge (which see). — 3. A frolic; a trick.

The one expressed his opinion that it was a 'rig,' and the other his conviction that it was a 'go.' Dickens.

— To run a rig, to play a sportive or wanton trick.

Away went Gilpin, neck or nought,
Away went hat and wig;

He little dreamt when he set out
Of running such a rig. Comper.

— To run the rig (or one's rig) upon, to practice a sportive trick on.

I am afraid your goddess of bed-making has been running her rig upon you. Smollett.

Rig (rig), v.i. To play the wanton. Chapman.
Rigadon (rig-a-dôn'), n. [Fr. rigadon, rigadon. Littré quotes from Rousseau to the effect that he heard a dancing-master say the word came from Rigaud, the surname of the inventor of the dance.] A gay brisk dance performed by one couple, and said to have been borrowed from Provence, in France.

Riga-fir (rî-gâ-fîr), n. A name given to the variety of the red or Scotch pine or fir (Pinus sylvestris) which comes to us from Riga. See SCOTCH PINE.

Rigation (rî-gâ-shon), n. [L. rigatio, rigationis, from ri-gō, to water. Akin G. regen, E. rain.] The act of watering; irrigation. H. Swinburne.

Rigel (rî-jel), n. [Ar. rijl, a person's foot.] A bright fixed star of the first magnitude in the left foot of the constellation Orion.

Rigger (rî-jîr), n. 1. One who rigs or dresses; specifically, one whose occupation is to fit the rigging of a ship. — 2. In mach. a cylindrical pulley or drum.

Rigging (rî-jîng), n. 1. Tackle; particularly, the ropes which support the masts, extend and contract the sails, &c., of a ship. This is of two kinds, standing rigging, as the shrouds and stays; and running rigging, comprehending all those ropes used in bracing the yards, making and shortening sails, &c., such as braces, sheets, halliards, clewlines, &c. — 2. The back; the ridge of a house; the top of anything; a roof. Gavin Douglas; Burns. [Scotch.]

Riggin'-tree (rîg-in-tré), n. A roof-tree. [Scotch.]

Rigglah (rîg'lah), a. Having the qualities of a rig or bad woman; hence, wanton; lewd.

For vilest things
Become themselves in her; that the holy priests
Bless her when she is rigglah. Shak.

Riggle (rîg'l), n. A name given to a species of sand-eel, the Ammodytes lanceus, or small-mouthed lanceus.

Riggle (rîg'l), v.i. To move one way and the other. See WRIGGLE.

Truth . . . forbids us to riggle into her presence through by-paths, and the cloudy medium of falsehood. Warburton.

Right (rit), a. [A. Sax. riht, right, true, just, straight; cog. D. reht, G. recht, O.G. reht, Goth. rahts, straight, parahits, just, loel. reht, Dan. ret. These are participial forms corresponding to the cognate L. rectus, straight, part. pret. of rego, rectum, to rule, direct (whence such words as regal, reign, direct, &c.); the root being seen also in Gr. oregō, to stretch out; Skr. riju, straight, rdj, to rule (whence rajah); Ir. and Gael. righ, a sovereign; W. rhafu, right, law; Armor. reiz, rez, right. Reach and rich are ultimately from same root.] 1. In conformity with the rules which ought to regulate human action; in accordance with duty; agreeably to the standard of truth and justice or the will of God; not wrong; just; equitable. That alone is right in the sight of God which is consonant to his will or law; this being the only perfect standard of truth and justice. In social and political affairs, that is right which is consonant to the laws and customs of a country, provided these laws and customs are not repugnant to the laws of God. 'His conduct still right, with his argument wrong.' Goldsmith.

The adjective right has a much wider signification than the substantive right. Everything is right which is conformable to the supreme rule of human action; but that only is a right, which, being conformable to the supreme rule, is realized in society and vested in a particular person. Hence the two words may often be properly opposed. We may say that a poor man has no right to relief, but it is right he should have it. A rich man has a right to destroy the harvest of his fields, but to do so would not be right. W. Howells.

2. Fit; suitable; proper; becoming; as, that is not the right expression to use; to take the right means of accomplishing an object; the right dress to use on a particular occasion. 'The right man in the right place.' Layard. — 3. Real; true; not spurious; actual; unquestionable; as, the right heir of an estate.

I would not have my right Rosalind of this mind, for, I protest, her frown might kill me. Shak.

In this battle . . . the Britons never more plainly manifested themselves to be right barbarians. Milton.

4. Not erroneous or wrong; according to fact or truth.

If there be no prospect beyond the grave, the inference is certainly right. 'Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die.' Locke.

5. Passing a true judgment; not mistaken or wrong; not in error.

You are right, justice, and you weigh this well. Shak.

The world will not believe a man repents;
And this wise world of ours is mainly right. Tennyson.

6. Not left, but its opposite; originally, no doubt, most useful or dexterous; as, the right hand; hence, being on the same side as the right hand; as, the right ear or eye.

She, on his left side, craving aid for Henry,
He, on his right, asking a wife for Edward. Shak.

— Right bank of a river, the bank on the right hand of a person whose face is turned in the direction in which the water runs; as, the right bank, or south side of the Thames.

7. Most favourable or convenient; fortunate.

The lady has been disappointed on the right side. Spectator.

8. Properly done, made, placed, disposed, or adjusted; orderly; well regulated; well performed; correct; as, the sum is not right; everything about the room was put right; the drawing is not right. — 9. Most direct or leading in the proper direction; as, the right way from London to Oxford. — 10. Applied to the side to be placed or worn outward; as, the right side of a piece of cloth. — 11. Straight; not crooked; as, a right line; hence, in mach. (a) rising perpendicularly; having a perpendicular axis; as, a right cone; a right cylinder, &c. (b) Formed by one line or direction perpendicular to another; as, a right angle. See ANGLE. — At right angles, so as to form a right angle or right angles; perpendicularly. — Right ascension. See ASCENSION. — Right is often used elliptically as an expression of approbation; it is right; you are right; true! 'Right, cries his lordship.' Pope.

Right, you say true; as Hereford's love, so his;
As theirs, so mine; and all be as it is. Shak.

SYN. Upright, lawful, rightful, true, correct, just, equitable, proper, fit, suitable, becoming, perpendicular, straight, direct.

Right (rit), adv. [A. Sax. rihte, rightly. See the adjective.] 1. In a right manner; justly; according to the law or will of God, or to the standard of truth and justice; as, to judge right. — 2. According to any rule or art; in order and to the purpose. 'With strict discipline instructed right.' Roscommon. — 3. According to fact or truth; truly; correctly; not erroneously; as, to tell a story right. 'You say not right, old man.' Shak. 4. In a great degree; very; as, right humble; right noble; right valiant.

Right many a widow his keen blade,
And many fatherless, had made. Hudibras.

In this sense the word is now commonly used only in titles; as, right honourable; right reverend, &c. — 5. Exactly; actually; really; just.

I will tell you everything right as it fell out. Shak.

6. In a right or straight line; directly. 'Let thine eyes look right on.' Prov. iv. 25.

You two this way, among these numerous orbs,
All yours, right down to Paradise descend. Milton.

— Right away, right off, immediately; at once; without delay. [Colloq. American.] — Right now, just now. 'Come he right now to sing a raven's note.' Shak. — Right and left, to the right and to the left; in all directions; as, the enemy were dispersed right and left. — To do one right, formerly, to pledge in a toast. Massinger. 'Why now you have done me right.' Shak.

Right (rit), n. 1. What is right; generally without the article or with the definite article; especially, (a) rectitude in conduct; conformity to the will of God; obedience to laws human or divine; agreeableness to reason, truth, or duty; propriety; freedom from guilt.

One rising, eminent
In wise deport, spake much of right and wrong,
Of justice, of religion, truth, and peace. Milton.

(b) Justice; an act of justice; that which is due or proper; uprightness; integrity; as, to do right to every man.

Long love to her has borne the faithful knight,
And well deserved, had fortune done him right. Dryden.

(c) Freedom from error; conformity with truth or fact. 'Thou hast spoke the right.' Shak.

Seldom your opinions err,
Your eyes are always in the right. Prior.

2. A just claim or that to which one has a just claim; that which a person may lawfully possess and use; that which may be lawfully claimed of any other person; as, (a) just claim; legal title; ownership; the legal power of exclusive possession and enjoyment.

My right to it appears,

By long possession of eight hundred years. Dryden.

(b) Just claim by courtesy, custom, or the principles of civility and decorum; as, every man has a right to civil treatment; the magistrate has a right to respect. (c) Just claim by sovereignty; prerogative.

God hath a sovereign right over us, as we are his creatures, and by virtue of this right, he might, without injustice, have imposed difficult tasks; but in making laws he hath not made use of this right. Tillemont.

(d) Privilege inhering in or belonging to one as member of a state, society, or community; as, natural, civil, political, religious, and public rights. 'Their own rights and liberties, due to them by the law.' Clarendon. (e) That which justly belongs to one. 'Born free he sought his right.' Dryden.

The man will cleave unto his right. Tennyson.

(f) Property; interest.

A subject in his prince may claim a right. Dryden.

(g) Power of action; authority; legal power;

as, the police have a right to arrest malefactors.—S. The side opposite to the left; as, on the right.

On his right
The radiant image of his glory sat,
His only Son. Milton.

—Right, left, extreme right, extreme left, terms derived from the usage of the French Chamber of Deputies or legislative assembly, where the party on the side of the administration occupy the right side of the hall, and the opposition the left side.—4. The most finished, or outward surface, as of a piece of cloth, &c.—5. In law, that which the law directs; a liberty of doing or possessing something consistently with law.—Right of action, a right to commence an action in a court of law.—Bill of rights, a list of rights; a paper containing a declaration of rights, or the declaration itself. Specially, the declaration delivered by the two houses of parliament to the Prince of Orange, Feb. 13, 1689-9; in which, after a full specification of various acts of James II., which were alleged to be illegal, the rights and privileges of the people were asserted.—Petition of right, a proceeding resembling an action by which a subject vindicates his rights against the crown.—Writ of right, an action which had for its object to establish the title to real property; now abolished, the same object being secured by the order of ejectment.—By right, by rights, rightfully; in accordance with right; properly.

I should have been a woman by right. Shak.

—To rights, in a direct line; straight. Woodward. [Rare.]—To set to rights or to put to rights, to put into good order; to adjust; to regulate what is out of order.—In one's own right, by absolute right; absolutely belonging or granted to one's self; as, peerages in their own right, that is as opposed to peerages by marriage.

A bride who had fourteen thousand a year in her own right. Trollope.

Righten (rit'n), v. t. To right; to do justice to. 'Relieve (in the margin righten) the oppressed.' Is. i. 17.

Righteous (rit'yus), a. [A. Sax. rihts, righteous—riht, right, and wis, wise, prudent; Joel. riht-vias, righteous, is formed exactly in the same way.] 1. Upright; incorrupt; virtuous; acting in accordance with the dictates of religion or morality; free from guilt or sin; in accordance with the divine law; as, a righteous man; a righteous act.

And if any man sh, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ, the righteous. 1 Jn. ii. 1.

2. Agreeing with right; just; equitable. 'And I thy righteous doom will bless.' Dryden.—Righteous, Just, Righteous, as contrasted with just, expresses rectitude of conduct, especially proceeding from considerations of religion, while just implies mere moral uprightness. A heathen may be just and moral, but would hardly be called righteous.—SYN. Upright, just, godly, holy, uncorrupt, virtuous, honest, equitable, right.

Righteous (rit'yus), v. t. To make righteous; to justify.

Can we merite grace with syme? or deserve to be righteous by folye? Bale.

Rinderpest (rînd'er-pest), n. [G. rinder, pl. of rind, a horned beast, and pest, a plague.] A most virulent and eminently contagious disease or plague, characterized by eruptive fever or exanthema, affecting ruminant animals, especially cattle, though capable of existing in sheep and goats. The disease is indigenous to the western steppes of Russia, and is communicable only by contagion or inoculation. The contagious matter is believed to consist of very minute particles of living matter, growing or multiplying at a rate far exceeding that of the growth of the normal germinal matter of the blood and tissues, so that they appropriate the pabulum of the tissues, and grow at their expense. They incubate after being received into the system, so that the disease does not declare itself openly till forty-eight hours after the poison has been imbibed. This disease has caused great havoc among cattle for at least a thousand years, spreading occasionally like a pestilence over Europe. During an outbreak in this country in 1867 between 200,000 and 300,000 cattle died of it or were ordered to be killed on account of it. The name is also given to an eminently fatal cattle disease of America, differing, however, from the true rinderpest in attacking cows only, and in running its course in three days in place of seven, the general duration of the European form of the disease.

Rindle (rînd'l), n. [From run, O.E. and Sc. rin; comp. rummel.] A small water-course or gutter.

Reinforzando (rin-for-tsan'dô), [It., strengthening.] In music, reinforcing or strengthening the power and emphasis of a musical sentence; a direction to the performer, denoting that the sound is to be increased. Ritualism (rit'ú-al-izm), n. 1. The system of rituals or prescribed form of religious worship.—2. Observance of prescribed forms in religion.—3. An excessive use of external forms in religion; the name commonly given to the remarkable increase of ceremonial which has taken place in a section of the Church of England. The changes made in the ritual have been generally in the direction of a more sensuous and ornate worship, and the infusion into outward forms of a larger measure of the typical element, with the object to assimilate the Anglican service as much as possible to that of other Catholic churches. Among the important innovations made are the following:—Special vestments at the celebration of the holy communion, and at certain other times; lighted candles on the altar at holy communion; the burning of incense; the mixing of water with wine for the communion; the use of wafer bread; elevation of the elements either during or after consecration; the attendance of non-communicants at the holy communion; and processions with crosses, banners, and vested attendants. Various judgments have been given in the ecclesiastical courts against extreme Ritualists, and some of their proceedings, as the elevation of the host, have been pronounced illegal.

River (river), n. (O Fr. riviere, Prov. Fr. river, Mod. Fr. riviere, a river, It. riviera, a bank, shore, a river, from an old term, riviera, a river, from L. rivus, of or pertaining to, or frequenting, the banks of a river, from rixa, a bank or shore. The primary name was land on the border of a river, then the course of the river itself.) 1. A large stream of water flowing through a certain portion of the earth's surface and discharging itself into the sea, a lake, marsh, or other river. A brook or rivulet is the name given to small streams of water, and a river is a stream of considerable size usually formed by the union of several such smaller streams. Rivers often join other rivers, and thus a large river is produced. This is called the principal river, and those which increase its waters are called, with respect to it, affluents or tributaries, and sometimes floods or branches. All the rills, streams, and rivulets which ultimately gather into one river form a river system, and the region of country which is drained by such a system is called a river basin. Basins are usually separated from each other by ranges of hills or mountains, and the line of demarcation between these basins, the line or axis of greatest elevation, is called the water shed. The first waters of a river are generally derived from springs, or from the gradual meltings of the ice and snow which perpetually cover the summits of all the most elevated ranges of mountains upon the globe. This is called the source of a river. From this source the river descends through the lowest part of its basin or drainage area until it terminate its course, the termination being called the mouth of the river. The cavity in which the running water flows is called the bed of the river, and the solid land which bounds this bed is called its banks. Most of the rivers in the tropical regions are subject to periodical overflows of their banks in consequence of the rains which annually fall in such abundance in those countries during the wet season. Another cause is the melting of snow and ice in the neighbourhood of their source. In a large class of rivers are divisible into navigable and non-navigable. The former are held to be the property of the crown, the latter the property of those through whose lands they flow. — 2. A large stream, capable flow, abundance, as, rivers of blood, rivers of oil. The full-flowing river of speech. Tennyson.

River-tortoise (river-tortoise), n. A name common to the members of the family Trionychidae, order Chelonidae. The river-tortoise are aquatic in their habits, coming to shore only to deposit their eggs. They are exclusively carnivorous, subsisting on fish, reptiles, birds, &c., which they eat in the water. The edges of the mandible are an sharp and firm that they easily snap off a man's finger. Well known species are the soft-shelled turtle (Trionyx ferox) and the large and fierce snapping turtle (Chelydra serpentina) of America. The carapace is covered, not with hard horny plates as in other tortoises, but with a tough leathery skin. Hence they are sometimes called soft tortoises. They inhabit almost every river and lake in the warmer regions in the Old and New Worlds, and are particularly plentiful in the Ganges, where they prey on human bodies.

River-wall (river-wall), n. In hydraulics, a wall made to confine a river within definite bounds, either to prevent inundation or erosion of the banks, to prevent overflow of the adjacent land, or to concentrate the force of the stream within a smaller area for the purpose of deepening a navigable channel.

Rivet (rivet), n. (Fr. rivet, a clinch, a rivet; rivet, to rivet; origin doubtful, probably from the Teutonic comp. root rya, to tack together, to sew together.) A short metallic pin or bolt passing through a hole and keeping two pieces of metal (or sometimes other substances) together. Especially a short bolt or pin of wrought iron, copper or of any other malleable material, formed with a head and inserted into a hole at the junction of two pieces of metal, the point after insertion being hammered broad so as to keep the pieces closely bound together. Rivets are usually hammered or clenched up when they are in a heated state, so as to once to facilitate the operation of clinching and to draw the pieces more firmly together by the contraction of the rivet when cool. It is in this manner that boilers, tanks, &c. are made. Instead of being closed by hammering, the rivets are now often closed by means of powerful machinery which makes better joints than can be made by hand, and executes the work far more quickly.

The armature accomplishing the clinching, with heavy hammers, leaving rivets up. Care detailed note of preparation. Shad.

Rivet (rivet), v. t. & p. p. riveted, pp. riveting 1. To fasten with a rivet or with rivets, as, to rivet two pieces of iron. 2. To clinch, as, to rivet a pin or bolt. 3. To fasten firmly to make firm, strong, or immovable, as, to rivet friendship or affection.

Roarer (rôr'êr), n. One who or that which roars: (a) a noisy, riotous person; a roaring boy; see under ROARING, p. and a. 'O strange! a lady to break glasses and turn roarer.' Massey. (b) One who shouts or bawls.

The roarer is an enemy rather terrible than dangerous. He has no other qualification for a champion of controversy than a hardened front or a strong voice. Johnson.

(c) A wave: a billow. Shak. (d) A broken-winded horse. See ROARING, p.

Roaring (rôr'ing), n. 1. A loud cry, as of a lion or other beast; outcry of distress, anger, and the like; loud continued sound, as of the billows of the sea or of a tempest.

I hear the roaring of the sea. Tennyson.

2. A disease of the bronchial tubes in horses, which causes them to make a singular noise in breathing under exertion; the act of making the noise so caused.

Roaring (rôr'ing), p. and a. 1. Characterized by or making a noise or disturbance; disorderly; riotous. 'A mad, roaring time, full of extravagance.' Burnet.—Roaring boys, the old cant name for a set of noisy, riotous ruffians who infested the streets of London about the beginning of the seventeenth century. They corresponded to the Mohocks of a later period.

And whilst you do judge 'twixt valour and noise, To extinguish the race of the roaring boys. B. Jonson.

2. Going briskly; highly successful; as, a roaring trade. [Colloq.]—The roaring game, curling. [Scottish.]

Roaringly (rôr'ing-li), adv. In a roaring manner.

Roary (rôr'î), a. Dewy; more properly Rory. Fairfax.

Roast (rôst), v.t. [O.Fr. roastir, Fr. rôtir, to roast, from O.H.G. rostjan, to roast (D. roosten, Sw. rosta, Dan. riale), or from the Celtic: Armor. rosta, W. rhostiaw, Gael. roist, to roast.] 1. To cook, dress, or prepare for the table, by exposure to the direct action of heat, on a spit, in an oven, or the like. We generally say, to roast meat on a spit, in a pan, or in a tin oven, &c.; to bake meat in an oven; to broil meat on a gridiron. 2. To heat to excess; to heat violently. 'Roasted in wrath and fire.' Shak.—3. To dry and parch by exposure to heat; as, to roast coffee.—4. In metal, to burn in a heap, as broken ore in order to free it from some foreign matters, such as sulphur, arsenic, carbonic acid, water, &c., and frequently to effect oxidation.—5. To banter severely; to tease unmercifully; to quizz. [Colloq.]

Roast (rôst), v.i. To become roasted or fit for eating by exposure to fire.

Roast (rôst), n. That which is roasted, as a piece of beef; that part of a slaughtered animal which is selected for roasting, as a sirloin of beef or shoulder of mutton.—To rule the roast, to have the chief direction of affairs; to have the lead; to domineer. 'Suffolk, the new-made duke that rules the roast.' Shak. [It has been conjectured that this phrase really stands for to rule the roist.]

Roast (rôst), a. Roasted; as, roast beef.—Roast-beef plant, a name given to the Iris foetidissima.

Roast-bitter (rôst-bit'êr), n. A peculiar bitter principle contained in the crust of baked bread, similar to that produced by the roasting of different other organic compounds.

Roaster (rôst'êr), n. 1. One who or that which roasts.—2. A pig or other animal or article for roasting.

When the peepul berries, or figs, are in season, their flesh (peacock's) is rather bitter; but when they have fed awhile among the corn-fields, they become remarkably sweet and juicy. This is to be understood of the young birds, which make excellent roasters. Capt. Williamson.

Roasting-jack (rôst'ing-jak), n. [From Jack, a name common to kitchen-boys.] An apparatus for turning the spit on which meat was roasted before an open fire.

Rob (rob), v. [Fr. rob, from Sp. rob, from Ar. robâ, a syrup or jelly of fruit.] The inspissated juice of ripe fruit, mixed with honey or sugar to the consistence of a conserve; a conserve of fruit. Arbutnot.

Rob (rob), v.t. pret. & pp. robbed; ppr. robbing. [From O.Fr. rober, Mod.Fr. robber, to steal, from O.H.G. rouban, Goth. rauban, to rob, to plunder; the same verb as A.Sax. redfan, in birafan, redfan; E. reave, D. rooven, Mod. G. rauben—to seize, to rob, to spoil; rob and reave being therefore parallel forms with a different history, the origin being O.G. raub, A.Sax. redf, a garment, clothing, as well as spoil (comp. robe).] 1. To plunder or strip by force or violence; to strip or deprive of something by stealing; to deprive unlawfully; as, to rob a man of his watch; to rob a coach; to rob an orchard; to rob a man of his just honours. As a legal term the word is defined to take from the person of, feloniously, forcibly, and by putting in fear; as, to rob a passenger on the road.

Rob not the poor because he is poor. Prov. xxii. 22.

2. To deprive; as, a large tree robs smaller plants near it of their nourishment.

So near the beautiful breast, That once had power to rob it of content. Tennyson.

3. To steal. 'To rob love from any.' Shak.

Roband (rob'and), n. Naut. a robbin or rope-band. See ROBBIN.

Robber (rob'êr), n. One who robs; one who commits a robbery: (a) in law, one that takes goods or money from the person of another by force or menaces, and with a felonious intent. (b) In a looser sense, one who takes that to which he has no right; one who steals, plunders, or strips by violence and wrong.—SYN. Thief, depredator, despoiler, plunderer, pillager, rifier, brig-and, freebooter, pirate.

Robber-crab (rob'êr-krab), n. One of the Paguride, or hermit-crabs.

Robbery (rob'êr-î), n. The act or practice of robbing; a plundering; a pillaging; a taking away by violence, wrong, or oppression.

Thieves for their robbery have authority When judges steal themselves. Shak.

Specifically, in law, the forcible and felonious taking from the person of another, or in his presence, of any money or goods, putting him in fear, that is, by violence or by menaces of death or personal injury. This violence or putting to fear is that which distinguishes robbery from other larcenies. SYN. Theft, depredation, apollation, despoliation, despoilment, plunder, pillage, freebooting, piracy.

Robbin (rob'in), n. 1. In com. the name given to the package in which Ceylones, &c., dry goods, as pepper, are imported. The Malabar robbin of rice weighs 84 lbs. Simmonds. 2. The spring of a carriage. Simmonds. 3. [From rope and band.] Naut. a short flat plaited piece of rope, with an eye in one end, used in pairs to tie the upper edges of square sails to their yards. Written also Roband.

Robe (rôb), n. [Fr. robe, from L.L. raubus, spoil, the taking of a man's garments, from O.G. raub, a garment, spoil, which in primitive times consisted chiefly of articles of dress. See ROB.] 1. A kind of gown or long loose garment worn over other dress, particularly by persons in elevated stations; a gown or dress of a rich, flowing, or elegant style or make. 'Robes loosely flowing.'

R. Jensen. The robe is properly a dress of state or dignity, as of princes, judges, priests, &c.

Through letter's clothes small vices do appear,
Robes and furs do govern beds all. Shak.

No those robes of complete jolly lives,
Which Rameau, our sacred founder, wore. Dryden.

—Master of the robes, an officer in the royal household whose duty, as the designation implies, consists in ordering the sovereign's robes. This officer has several officers under him, as a clerk of the robes, a yeoman, three grooms, a page, a brusher, furrier, sempstress, laundress, starcher, and standing wardrobe-keeper, at St. James's, Windsor Castle, Hampton Court, &c. Under a queen this office is performed by a lady, designated Mistress of the robes, who enjoys the highest rank of the ladies in the service of the queen. — 2 A dressed buffalo skin. — 3 A coat of robes, ten skins tied in a pack. This is the manner in which they are brought to market from the west.

Robe (rôb), v. t. pres. & pp. robed, pp. robing. 1 To invest, dress, or clothe in a robe, or to dress with magnificence; to array. 'The sage Chalmers robed in white apparel.' Pope. — 2 To dress, to invest, as with beauty or elegance, as, fields robed with green. 'The hand that robed your cottage-walk with flowers.' Tennyson.

Such was his power over the expression of his countenance, that he could in an instant change all the sternness of winter and robe it in the brightest smiles of spring. Wort.

Robe-maker (rôb'mâk-er), n. A maker of official robes for clergymen, barristers, aldermen, &c.

Robardman, Robartman (rôb'ard-man, rôb'art-man), n. A term applied in old times to any bold stout robber or night thief, said to be so called from Robin Hood, the famous robber.

Robert (rôb'ert), n. A plant of the genus Geranium, the G. Robertianum, called also stinking crane's-bill. It is a pretty little plant, with much-cut leaves and bright pink flowers. It grows in waste ground, by walls, among stones, and debris of roofs. Called also Herb robert.

Robertia, Robertine (rôb'er-tin), n. One of an order of monks, so called from Robert Flower, the founder, A.D. 1157.

Robin (rôb'in), n. [A familiar form of Robert. Comp. May for maggio and Jack for jacobus.] 1 A well-known bird of the genus Erythracus, the E. rubecula, Linn. Called also Redbreast and Robin-redbreast. 2 In the United States, a bird with a red breast, a species of Turdus, the T. migratorius. — Golden Robin, the song-bird, or Baltimore Oriole (Icterus Baltimore). — Ragged Robin, a plant found in meadows and moist pastures (Lychnis flos-cuculi). — Robin's plantain, a plant of the genus Eriogonum (E. bellidifolium), having composite flowers with light, bluish purple rays. See Gray.

Robinet (rôb'in-ét), n. [Dim. of robin; in fr., directly from the French, the origin being the same.] 1 Robin-redbreast. Dryden. 2 An ancient military machine for throwing darts and stones. Admiral Smyth. — 3 A name given to some of the cocks of the steam-engine as the gags, brins, and trial cocks. R. H. Knight.

Robin-Goodyellow (rôb-in-gôd'el-lô), n. A domestic spirit or fairy, said to be the offspring of a young woman and Oberon, king of Fairyland. He is analogous to the Brownie of Scotland. It was from the popular belief in this spirit that Shakespeare's Puck was derived.

Robing-room (rôb'ing-rôom), n. A vestitory, where robes of ceremony are put on and off, as the poets' robing-room in the House of Lords.

Robin-Hood (rôb'in hûd), n. [The name of a celebrated English outlaw.] A character in May-day and other games.

Robinia (rôb'în-â), n. [In honour of Jean Robin, a French botanist, once herbalist to Henry IV of France.] A small genus of North American trees, belonging to the papilionaceous division of the nat. order Leguminosae, which bear nodding racemes of white or rose-coloured flowers. They are trees or shrubs, often with prickly spines for stipules, and odd pinnate leaves. The best known species is the R. Pseudacacia, the bastard or false acacia, or locust-tree of America. The wood is exceedingly hard and durable, and takes a fine polish. For many purposes it is scarcely inferior to oak, which it rivals in toughness and strength. It is much grown in England as an ornamental tree.

Robin-redbreast (rôb-in-red'breast), n. A robin.

Robin-raddock (rôb-in-rad'dok), n. Robin-redbreast. Richard Edwards. See RUDDOCK. Robin-wake (rôb'in wâk), n. Same as Wake-Robin. See ARCTIC.

Roborant (rôb'o-rant), a. [L. roborens, roborens pp. of robore, to make strong, from robur, strength.] Strengthening.

Roborant (rôb'o-rant), n. A medicine that strengthens, a tonic.

Roborate (rôb'o-rât), v. t. [Use above.] To give strength to, to strengthen, to condense, to establish. Fuller.

Roboration (rôb'o-râ'tion), n. [Use above.] A strengthening. [Rare.]

Roboreous, Roboreous (rôb'o-rê-ous, rôb'o-rê-ous), a. [L. roboreus, from robur, strength, and ous oak.] Made of oak strong. [Rare.]

Robur Caroli (rôb'er har'ô-l), n. [L.] The Royal Oak, a modern southern constellation consisting of twelve stars.

Robust (rô bust'), a. [L. robustus, from robur, an old form of robur, an oak, strength.] 1 Possessed of or indicating great strength, strong, lusty, sinewy, muscular; vigorous, sound, as, a robust body, robust youth, robust health. 'His robust, distended chest.' Young. 'Robust, tough sinews, lived to toil.' Cooper. 2 Sound, vigorous, as, robust health. — 3 Violent, rough, rude.

Robust-looking man.
Is hard & stout in pulchery robust. Thomson.

4 Requiring vigour or strength; as, robust employment. — Byn. Strong, lusty, sinewy, sturdy, muscular, hale, hearty, vigorous, forceful, sound.

Robustness (rô bust'yus), n. Robust. 'These redundant leeches (of Samson), robustness to no purpose. Milton. [Obsolete, or now used only in a ludicrous sense or in contempt. See also its derivatives robustiously and robustness.]

In Scotland they had hooded the bishops in a more robustness manner. Milton.

Robustiously (rô bust'yus-ly), adv. In a robustness manner, with vigour, sturdily. 'They come in robustiously.' A. Johnson.

Robustness, Robustness (rô bust'yus-ness, rô bust'as-ness), n. Vigour, muscular size and strength.

That robustness of body, and puissance of power, which is the only fruit of strength. Samuel.

Robustly (rô bust'ly), adv. In a robust manner, with great strength, muscularly.

Robustness (rô bust'ness), n. The quality of being robust, strength, vigour, or the condition of the body when it has full firm flesh and sound health.

Roë (rô), n. The well-known monstrous bird of Arabian mythology, of the same fabulous species with the stymph of the Persians.

Roëmbale (rô-amb-âl), n. [Fr. from O roëmbale, roëmb, rye, and balle, a bulb, because it grows amongst rye.] Allium Scordoprammum, a garlic which grows in Denmark, &c. and is cultivated for the same purposes as the onion and garlic.

Roëmbale (rô-amb-âl), n. [Altered from the Portuguese roëmb, a rock, in allusion to its place of growth.] A genus of Echinacea, one species of which (R. tinctoria) yields the dye so largely used in dyeing operations under the name of cochineal or carthai.

Roëmbale (rô-amb-âl), n. [Altered from the Portuguese roëmb, a rock, in allusion to its place of growth.] A genus of Echinacea, one species of which (R. tinctoria) yields the dye so largely used in dyeing operations under the name of cochineal or carthai.

Roëmbale (rô-amb-âl), n. [Altered from the Portuguese roëmb, a rock, in allusion to its place of growth.] A genus of Echinacea, one species of which (R. tinctoria) yields the dye so largely used in dyeing operations under the name of cochineal or carthai.

Roëmbale (rô-amb-âl), n. [Altered from the Portuguese roëmb, a rock, in allusion to its place of growth.] A genus of Echinacea, one species of which (R. tinctoria) yields the dye so largely used in dyeing operations under the name of cochineal or carthai.

Roëmbale (rô-amb-âl), n. [Altered from the Portuguese roëmb, a rock, in allusion to its place of growth.] A genus of Echinacea, one species of which (R. tinctoria) yields the dye so largely used in dyeing operations under the name of cochineal or carthai.

Roëmbale (rô-amb-âl), n. [Altered from the Portuguese roëmb, a rock, in allusion to its place of growth.] A genus of Echinacea, one species of which (R. tinctoria) yields the dye so largely used in dyeing operations under the name of cochineal or carthai.

Roëmbale (rô-amb-âl), n. [Altered from the Portuguese roëmb, a rock, in allusion to its place of growth.] A genus of Echinacea, one species of which (R. tinctoria) yields the dye so largely used in dyeing operations under the name of cochineal or carthai.

Roëmbale (rô-amb-âl), n. [Altered from the Portuguese roëmb, a rock, in allusion to its place of growth.] A genus of Echinacea, one species of which (R. tinctoria) yields the dye so largely used in dyeing operations under the name of cochineal or carthai.

oil, O.) The double tartrate of soda and potash. It has a mild, hardly saline taste, and acts as a laxative.

Roëmbale (rô-amb-âl), n. [Fr. roëmb, a rock, and montagne, a mountain, a steep, from monter, to ascend.] The name given to the rounded and smoothed masses of rock occurring in the beds of ancient glaciers from their fancied resemblance to the backs of sheep. They have received their form and smoothness from the action of ice.

Roëmbale (rô-amb-âl), n. [Fr. roëmb, a blouse, a little jacket, from O roëmb, O.H.G. roëmb, O.E. and Sc. roëmb, a coat.] 1 A sort of short surplice, with tight sleeves, and open at the sides, formerly worn by priests and acolytes, but at present restricted to bishops and certain privileged canons. — 2 A mantle worn during ceremonies by the poets of England. — 3 A loose round frock or upper garment. Chambers.

Roëmbale (rô-amb-âl), n. [Dim. of roëmb, old spelling of reach.] A kind of fish, the reach (which see), or, according to Nares, the piper, one of the gurnards. Roëmbale whitings, or such common fish. W. Brown.

The whitings, known to all, a general whiteness fish, The garnet, roëmb, sharp, and mollet, dainty fish. Dryden.

Roëmbale (rô-amb-âl), n. [A Scandinavian word. loëmb, roëmb, Dan. roëmb, a distaff, D. roëmb, O. roëmb.] A distaff used in spinning, the staff or frame about which flax, wool, &c., is arranged from which the thread is drawn in spinning.

How down the roëmb my flax, and softly flow,
Purges thy thread, the spindle runs below. Parrot.

Roëmbale (rô-amb-âl), v. t. [Dan. roëmb, to move, to shake, O. roëmb, to move, to push.] 1 To move backwards and forwards, as a body resting on a support beneath, as, to roëmb a cradle, to roëmb a chair, sometimes to cause to roll or totter. It differs from shake, as denoting a slower and more uniform motion or larger movements. It differs from swing, which expresses a vibratory motion of something suspended.

A rising earthquake roëmb'd the ground. Dryden.
He, like the tender office long engaged To roëmb the cradle of repose, &c. Pope.

2 To move backwards and forwards in a cradle, chair, &c., as, to roëmb a child to sleep. 'High in his hall, roëmb'd in a chair of state.' Dryden. 3 To jolt, to quiet, as if by rocking in a cradle. 'Sleep roëmb thy brain.' Shak.

Roëmbale (rô-amb-âl), v. t. To move backwards and forwards, to be moved backwards and forwards, to roëmb.

Supplants their footings; to and fro they roëmb.
The whole dialogue Jean had been carrying on his chair. Tennyson.

The blind well roëmb, and on the trees
The dead leaf trembles to the touch. Tennyson.

Roëmbale (rô-amb-âl), n. [Fr. roëmb, according to Brachet from a form rapine, from L. rapere, a rock, roëmb, also a rock, being from rapere, a similar form. Littre regards it as of Celtic origin.] 1 A large mass of stony matter; a large sized stone or crag, as a projecting rock, the stony matter constituting the earth's crust, as distinguished from soil, mud, sand, gravel, clay, peat, &c. a foundation composed of rock. In this general sense coal, shale, chalk, gypsum, salt, and the like, are not regarded as rock. 'A rugged, fearful, hanging rock.' Shak.

Ye dark some piers that, o'er yon rocks reclined, Wave high, and murmur to the hollow wind. Pope.

2 In geol. any natural deposit or portion of the earth's crust, whatever be its hardness or softness. In this sense sand, mud, clay, peat, coal, gypsum, salt, are rocks. There are two grand divisions of rocks into igneous and igneous, or those formed by the agency of water and those formed by the agency of fire. Aqueous rocks may be grouped into three classes, in accordance with the mode of their origin, viz. (a) metamorphosed rocks or sedimentary rocks, formed from the detritus or waste of older rocks brought down by rivers and deposited in the bed of the sea or of lakes. Sedimentary rocks are stratified. Sedimentary is an example. (b) Organically formed rocks, or rocks consisting of accumulations of organic remains. Chalk and many limestones are remains of shells of animals. Coal and peat of vegetables. (c) Chemically formed rocks, or rocks formed by chemical agency, as gypsum, rock salt, and some limestones. The originally soft strata of aqueous rocks, as mud, sand, decayed vegetation, and the like, owe their consolidation chiefly to four causes, viz. pressure of superincumbent strata, heat, chemical agency, and infiltration of some material, as silica, or some salt of lime or iron, which acts as a cement. Stratified rocks, whose structure has become crystalline under the influence of heat and probably of chemical reagents, are called metamorphic rocks. (See METAMORPHIC.) Igneous rocks have been divided into two sections, plutonic and volcanic. Plutonic rocks have been consolidated from a molten state underneath the ground under a great pressure. They are highly crystallized. Granite is an example. Volcanic rocks have been projected up from beneath in a molten state. They have also two divisions, crystalline and fragmental. Lava and basalt are examples of crystalline volcanic rocks. Tuff, which is consolidated volcanic dust and stones, is fragmental. Another division of volcanic rocks is into condemporeous and intrusive. Contemporaneous rocks are those which, being ejected from the crater of a volcano, have been poured on the surface of the earth or the bottom of the sea. The position of such a rock indicates the age of its ejection. Lava proper and the tuffaceous of Derbyshire, are examples. Intrusive rocks are such as have been forced up from below in a molten state through the superincumbent sedimentary strata, altering the rocks they are in contact with, filling up fractures and branches, and so forming dykes and veins, and causing faults. Some basaltic and traps are examples. They are simply ancient and very compact lava. A single rock, or several rocks united by certain common characters, constitute a formation, as the granite formation, the coal formation, because they have been formed or deposited under similar conditions. Several formations constitute a system. Thus the carboniferous system includes the lower coal, mountain limestone, millstone grit, and upper coal, the evaporitic system comprises not only calcareous, but also argillaceous and arenaceous rocks. The crust of the earth, so far as least as we can examine it, is chiefly made up of sedimentary and organic rocks. In these rocks therefore must the chief sources of evidence for the history of the earth be sought. If we could pile them up, one above another, in the order of their formation, they would form a mass probably more than a dozen miles thick. This constitutes the library out of which geological history must be compiled. 2. A stone of any size, a pebble. (Colloquial American.)

I had it is not decent for a geologist to go.
To say another is an one—least to all intent;
How should the individual who happens to be named
Reply by bearing rocks to him to any good extent.

4. In Ship (sp.) defense: means of safety, protection, strength, armor. 'The Lord is my rock.' 2 Sam. xli. 2.—5. A cause or source of peril or disaster, as, this was the rock on which he split a sage derived from vessels being wrecked on rocks.—6. A name for a kind of mild sweetmeat. On the rocks, quite out of funds, in great want of money (slang).

Rock (rok), v. t. To throw stones at, to stone. (Southern and Western States of America.)

Rock (rok), n. A fabulous bird which figures in Eastern tales. See Roc.

Rock-alum (rok'al um), n. The purest kind of alum, properly, a reddish variety of native alum found near Civita Vecchia in Italy.

Rockaway (rok'a-wé), n. A low four-wheeled carriage for two, with full standing top.

Rock-basin (rok'bá-un), n. 1. In pluv. geog. a basin or hollow of considerable size, deepened out by glacial or other action, entirely surrounded by rocky walls, and often containing a lake.

It is easy to see that lakes are the result of the formation of basins, a great proportion of which are true rock-basins, that is to say, basins entirely surrounded by solid rock, the water not being retained by more loose strata. A. C. Ramsay

2. A basin-shaped cavity occurring in the granite of high and exposed regions like that of Dartmoor in Devonshire, and varying from 1 to many feet in diameter, and from a few inches to several feet in depth, with edges more or less sloping and generally containing pebbles or other gravelly detritus, whose origin, with the aid of water, seems to have been the efficient cause of their formation. Formerly it was popularly believed that these excavations were the work of the Druids. Page.

Rock-bound (rok'bound), a. Hemmed in by rocks.

The bounding waves dash d high
On a shore and rock-bound coast. Mrs. Hemans.

Rock-butter (rok'bú-ter), n. A soft, yellowish, somewhat stuccose admixture of alum, alumina, and oxide of iron coating out of rocks containing alum. It is a product of decomposition. Page.

Rock-cod (rok'kod), n. A cod taken on rocky sea-bottoms. Rock-cod are considered the best.

Rock-cork (rok'kork), n. Mountain-cork, a white or gray-colored variety of asbestos so called from its lightness and spongy structure.

Rock-cream (rok'kree), n. The common name of several species of cruciferous plants of the genus Arabis, one of which, A. alpina, a tufted plant with white flowers, is a common spring garden plant.

Rock-crowned (rok'króund), a. Crowned or surmounted with rocks, as, a rock-crowned height.

Rock-crystal (rok'kris-tál), n. Limpid quartz. When purest it is white or colourless, but it is found of a grayish or yellowish white, pale yellow, citrine, red, black, &c. The purple variety is known as amethyst, the yellow as topaz, and the amber-coloured as carnegorm, and so on. Its most usual form is that of hexagonal prisms surmounted by hexagonal pyramids.

Rock-deer (rok'dé), n. A species of Alpine deer. R. Ovis.

Rock-dove (rok'dur), n. Same as Rock-pigeon.

Rock-drill (rok'drít), n. A tool for drilling or boring rock by a chisel or rotatory motion. One of the many forms of this instrument is described under DIAMOND-DRILL.

Rockelay, Rocklay (rok'-lá, rok'-lá), n. A short cloak, a requiem (which see). Written also Rockley (Scottish).

Lucky Machinery, having got on hay chains too, suddenly, and scarlet plaid, gravely caused the arrival of the company, in full hope of custom and profit.
See M. Scott

Rockier (rok'ér), a. 1. One who rocks anything, as a cradle. 'His fellow was weary and without a rocker slept.' Dryden. 2. The carving piece of wood on which a cradle or rocking-chair rocks.—3. A rocking-horse.

There were boats of all sorts in a bay-shed, houses, in particular, of every kind, from the spotted barrel on four legs to the thoroughbred rocker on his highness's motto.
Dickens

4. A rock-shaft (which see).—5. A cradle or trough for washing ore by agitation, as, a rocker for separating gold-dust from gravel, &c.

Rockery (rok'é-ri), n. An artificial mound formed of stones or fragments of rock, earth, &c., for the cultivation of particular kinds of plants, as ferns.

Rocket (rok'et), n. Same as Rocket.

Rocket (rok'et), n. [It resembles from sound, a distaff, a rock, from the German.] 1. A cylindrical tube of pasteboard or metal filled with a mixture of nitre, sulphur, charcoal, &c., which on being ignited at the base, propels it forward by the action of the liberated gases against the atmosphere. Rockets are used for various purposes, as (a) in war, when the apparatus generally consists of a sheet-iron case filled with a composition such as is described above, and a head which may be solid, or hollow and filled with a bursting charge. (b) Life-rocket, used for carrying a line over a wreck, and thus establishing a communication between a ship and the shore. (c) Signal or sky rockets, pasteboard cylinders filled with nearly the same composition, but with a conical head containing stars of various ingredients and colours, and a quantity of powder which, when the rocket has attained its greatest height, bursts the cylinder causing the ignited stars to spread through the air and cast a brilliant or coloured light which may be seen at a good distance. They are used in signalling or for mere pyrotechnic display. They are kept pointed forward in their flight by means of a stick projecting behind, which acts as the feathers of an arrow.
And the dead went on himself (the Rocket) has been shot, so he rose like a rocket, he (as the poet).
T. Moore

A square measure, the fourth part of a statute acre, and equal to 40 square perches or square poles, or 1210 square yards. See ACRE.—2. A measure of 4½ yards in length; a rod, pole, or perch; also, a square pole, or 27¼ square feet, used in estimating mason work.—3. A cross or crucifix; especially, a large crucifix placed at the entrance to the chancel in medieval churches, often supported on the rood-beam or rood-screen. Sometimes images of the Virgin Mary and St. John were placed, the one on the one side and the other on the other side of the image of Christ, in allusion to John xix. 26.

Yea, by God's rood, I trusted you too much.
Tennyson.

Beside the first pool, near the wood,
A dead tree in set horror stood,
Peeled and disjointed, stark as rood.
E. B. Browning.

Rood-arch (róð'arch), n. The arch in a church between the nave and chancel, so called from the rood being placed here.

Rood-beam (róð'bém), n. A beam across the entrance to the chancel of a church for supporting the rood.

Rood-bok (róð'e-bok), n. [D. rood, red, bok, a buck.] The Natal bush-buck (Cephalopus Natalensis). It is of a deep reddish-brown, stands about 2 feet high, has large ears, and straight, pointed horns about 3 inches long. It is solitary in its habits, and rarely leaves the dense forests except in the evening or during rainy weather.

Rood-free (róð'fré), a. Exempt from punishment. [Rare.]

Rood-loft (róð'loft), n. The gallery in a church where the rood and its appendages were placed. This loft or gallery was commonly placed over the rood-screen in parish churches, or between the nave and chancel. The front of this loft, like the screen below, was usually richly ornamented with tracery and carvings, either in wood or in stone. It was approached by a small staircase in the wall of the building.

Rood-screen (róð'skrén), n. A screen or ornamental partition separating the choir of a church from the nave, and often supporting the rood or crucifix.

Rood-tower, Rood-steeple (róð'tou-ér, róð'sté-pl), n. The tower or steeple built over the intersection of a cruciform church.

Rood-tree (róð'tré), n. The cross. 'Died upon the rood-tree.
Gower.

Roody (róð'i), a. Rank in growth; coarse; luxurious. [Provincial.]

Roof (róf), n. [A. Sax. hróf, a roof; cog. O. Fr. hróf, a top, a roof; Icel. hróf, a shed under which ships are built; ráf, ráfr, a roof; D. roef, a cover, a cabin.] 1. The cover of any house or building, irrespective first, the king-post principal, and the second, the queen-post principal, with the purlins and common rafters in situ. The mode of framing here exhibited is termed a truss.

Sometimes, when the width of the building is not great, common rafters are used alone to support the roof. They are in that case joined together in pairs, nailed where they meet at top, and connected with a tie at the bottom. They are then termed *couple*s, a pair forming a couple close.—2. That which corresponds with or resembles the covering of a house, as the arch or top of a furnace or oven, the top of a carriage, coach, car, &c.; an arch, or the interior of a vault; hence, a canopy or the like; as, the roof of heaven.

On their naked limbs the flowery roof
Shower'd roses.
Milton.

3. A house.

If time, and food, and wine enough accrue
Within your roof to us.
Chapman.

4. The upper part of the mouth; the palate. 'Swearing till my very roof was dry. Shak.

Roof (róf), v. t. 1. To cover with a roof.

I have not seen the remains of any Roman buildings, that have not been roofed with vaults or arches.
Addison.

2. To inclose in a house; to shelter.

Here had we now our country's honour roof'd.
Shak.

Roofer (róf'ér), n. One who roofs or makes roofs.

Roofing (róf'ing), n. 1. The act of covering with a roof.—2. The materials of which a roof is composed, or materials for a roof.—3. The roof itself; hence, shelter. 'Fit roofing gave.' Southey.

Roofless (róf'les), a. 1. Having no roof; as, a roofless house.

I, who lived
Beneath the wings of angels yesterday,
Wander to-day beneath the roofless world.
E. B. Browning.

2. Having no house or home; unsheltered.

Rooflet (róf'let), n. A small roof or covering.

Roof-tree (róf'tré), n. 1. The beam in the angle of a roof. Hence.—2. The roof itself.

A long farewell to Locksley Hall!
Now for me the woods may wither, now for me the roof-tree fall.
Tennyson.

—To your roof-tree, in Scotland, a toast expressive of a wish for prosperity to one's family, because the roof-tree covers the house and all in it.

As we say among familiar acquaintance, 'To your Fire-side,' he (the Highlander) says much to the same purpose, 'To your roof-tree,' alluding to the family's safety from tempests.
Burt.

Roofy (róf'i), a. Having roofs.

Whether to roofy houses they repair,
Or sun themselves abroad in open air.
Dryden.

Rook (rók), n. [A. Sax. hrók, D. rook, L. G. rók, Icel. hrók, Sw. roka, O. H. G. hruch, Prov. G. roche—all names derived from the cry which the bird utters, like crow and raven. Comp. Gael. roc, to croak, rocas, a rook, and L. raucus, hoarse.] 1. A bird of the genus Corvus (C. frugilegus). This bird resembles the crow, but differs from it in not feeding on carrion, but on insects and grain. In crows, also, the nostrils and root of the bill are clothed with feathers, but in rooks the same parts are naked, or have only a few bristly hairs. The rook is content with feeding on the insect tribe (particularly the larvae of the cockchafer) and on grain; and there can be no doubt that it amply repays the farmer for the seed it takes, by its assiduity in clearing the land of wire-worms and the destructive grub. Rooks are gregarious at all seasons, resorting constantly to the same trees every spring to breed, when the nests may be seen upon the upper branches. They are spread over the greater part of Europe, but nowhere do they seem to be more abundant than in Great Britain and Ireland.—2. A cheat; a trickish rapacious fellow; one who practices the plucking of pigeons. (See PIGEON.) 'Tormentors, rooks, and rakeshames, sold to lucre.' Milton.

Rook (rók), v. t. To cheat; to defraud. 'A band of rooking officials.' Milton.

Rook (rók), v. t. 1. To cheat; to defraud by cheating.—2. To castle at chess.

Rook (rók), n. [Fr. roc, It. rocco, Sp. roque, from Per. and Ar. rokh, the rook or castle at chess.] In chess, one of the four pieces placed on the corner squares of the board; also called a Castle. The rook moves the whole extent of the board, in lines parallel to its sides, unless impeded by some other piece.

Rook (rók), v. i. To squat or sit close; to ruck.

The raven rook'd her in the chimney's top. Shak.

Rookery (rók'ér-i), n. 1. A wood, &c., used for nesting-places by rooks. The term is also applied in an extended sense to rocks and islets frequented by sea-birds for laying their eggs, and to a resort for seals for breeding purposes.—2. The rocks belonging to a rookery. 'The many-winter'd crow that leads the clanging rookery home.' Tennyson. 3. A brothel. (Slang.)—4. A close assemblage of poor mean buildings inhabited by the lowest class; a resort of thieves, sharpers, &c.

That classical spot adjoining the brewery at the bottom of Tottenham-Court-Road, best known to the initiated as the Rookery. Dickens.

Rook-pie (rök'pi), n. A pie made of rooks. Dickens.

Rooky (rök'i), a. Inhabited by rooks; as, 'the rooky wood.' Shak.

Room (röm), n. [A. Sax. rām, O. Sax. O. Fris. Icel. rūm, Dan. and O. G. rām, Mod. O. raum, room, space; Goth. ruma, place, space. Akin row, ruin, ruin.] 1. Space; compass; extent of place, great or small; as, to occupy as little room as possible.

Their heads sometimes so little, that there is no room for wit; sometimes so long, that there is no wit for so much room. Fuller.

2. Space or place unoccupied or unobstructed; place for reception or admission of any thing or person.

Lord, it is done as thou hast commanded, and yet there is room. Luke xiv. 22.

3. Fit occasion; ability to admit or allow; opportunity; freedom to act; as, in this case there is no room for doubt or for argument.

There was no prince of the empire who had room for such an alliance. Addison.

4. Place or station once occupied by another; stead, as in succession or substitution; as, one magistrate or king comes in the room of a former one. 'Evils, that cannot be removed without the manifest danger of greater to succeed in their rooms.' Hooker.—5. An apartment in a house; any division separated from the rest by a partition; as, a parlour, a drawing-room, or bedroom; also, an apartment in a ship; as, the cook-room, bread-room, gun-room, &c.—6. A box or seat at the play. 'If he sit in the twelve-penny room.' Marston.—7. A family; company.

For offer'd presents come, And all the Greeks will honour you as of celestial room. Chapman.

8. Particular place or station; a seat. 'The uppermost rooms at feasts.' Mat. xxiii. 6. 'Neither that I look for a higher room in heaven.' Tyndale.—9. Office; post; position. 'His high room of chancellorship.' G. Cavendish.—10. A fishing-station in British North America. Sinmonds.—To make room, to open a way or passage; to remove obstructions; to open a space or place for anything.—To give room, to withdraw; to leave space unoccupied for others to pass or to be seated.—SYN. Space, compass, scope, latitude.

Room (röm), v. i. To occupy an apartment; to lodge; as, he rooms at No. 7. [American.]

Room (röm), n. A deep blue dye obtained from an Assamese plant of the genus Ruellia.

Roomaget (röm'áj), n. [From room.] Space; place.

Roomal, Rūmal (rō'm'al), n. [Hind.] 1. A handkerchief; a napkin; a towel.—2. The slip-knot handkerchief employed by the Thugs or hereditary strangers of India in their murderous operations.

They had arranged their plan, which was very simple. If the darkness suited, Shumshooden Khan was to address a question to Rowley Mellon, who would stoop from his horse to listen; Pershad Sing was then to cast the roomal over his head, and drag him from his horse into the Mango tope, when the holy pick-axe would soon do the rest. James Grant.

Rooman (rō'm'an), n. An Indian name for the pomegranate.

Roomer (rōm'ér), adv. Farther off; at a greater distance.—To go or put roomer (naut.), to tack about before the wind.

Roomful (rōm'ful), a. Abounding with rooms or room. Donne.

Roomful (rōm'ful), n. As much or as many as a room will hold; as, a roomful of people.

Roomily (rōm'i-li), adv. Spaciously.

Roominess (rōm'i-nes), n. State of being roomy; spaciousness.

Roomless (rōm'les), a. Without room or rooms. 'Narrow and roomless.' Udall.

Room-ridden (rōm'rid-n), a. [On type of bedridden.] Confined to one's room, as by sickness. 'The room-ridden invalid.' Dickens. [Rare.]

Roomsome (rōm'sum), a. Roomy. 'Not only capable but roomsome.' Keelyn.

Roomth (rōmth), n. 1. Room.

The sea then wanting roomth to lay their boisterous load, Upon the Belgian marsh their pamp'rd stomachs cast. Dryden.

2. Roominess; spaciousness. 'A monstrous paunch for roomth, and wondrous wide.' Mir. for Mags.

Roomthy (rōmth'i), a. Spacious.

The land was far roomthier than the scale of miles doth make it. Fuller.

Roomy (rōm'i), a. Having ample room; spacious; wide; large; as, a roomy mansion. 'Roomy decks.' Dryden.

Roop (rōp), v. i. [A. Sax. hrōpan, Sc. roup, Icel. hrōpa, D. roepen, Fr. hrope, Goth. hroþja, to cry, to scream. Akin roup, croup.] To cry; to shout. [Old and Provincial English.]

Roop (rōp), n. A cry; a call; also hoarseness. Ray. [Provincial.]

Roopit (rōp'it), a. Hoarse. [Scotch.]

Roorbach (rōr'hak), n. [A word which originated in the United States in 1844 from a fictitious story of some notoriety having been published purporting to be an extract from the 'Travels of Baron Roorbach.' A fictitious story published for the purposes of political intrigue. [United States.]

Roosea-oil (rō'sa-oil), n. An Indian volatile oil extracted from Andropogon Schœnanthus, used to adulterate attar of roses. Called also Roosea-grass Oil.

Roose, Ruise (rōz), v. t. [A Scandinavian word: Icel. Arúsa, Dan. roos, Sw. roas, to praise.] To extol; to commend highly. 'To roose you up, and ca' you guld.' Burns. [Scotch.]

Roost (rōst), n. [A. Sax. Arōst, D. roest, a roost. Connections doubtful.] 1. The pole or other support on which fowls rest at night.

He clapp'd his wings upon his roost. Dryden.

2. A collection of fowls roosting together.—At roost, in a state of rest and sleep.

A fox spied out a cock at roost upon a tree. Sir R. L. Estlin.

Roost (rōst), v. i. 1. To occupy a roost; to sit, rest, or sleep, as fowls on a pole, tree, or other thing at night.—2. To lodge; to settle.

Roost (rōst), n. See ROOST.

Roost-cock (rōst'kok), n. The domestic cock. [Provincial.]

Rooster (rōst'ér), n. The male of the domestic fowl; a cock. 'They wrung the neck of a rooster.' Irving. [American.]

Root (rōt), n. [Directly from the Scandinavian, not found in Anglo-Saxon. Icel. rót, Sw. rot, Dan. rod. Supposed to be connected with L. radix, Gr. rhiza, a root.] 1. That part of a plant which enters and fixes itself in the earth, or, in the case of parasites, to other plants, and serves to support the plant, while by means of its radicles it imbibes nutriment for the stem, branches, leaves, and fruit. There are six distinct organs which are capable of entering into the composition of a root, viz. the radicle, the fibrid, the soboles, the bulb, the tuber, and the rhizome. Roots receive different names according to their structure, forms, and positions, as branched, bulbiferous, fibrous, horizontal, oblique, simple, tapering, vertical, &c.—Aerial roots, (a) small roots shooting from the stem of a plant and attaching themselves to the bark of trees; the roots of parasitic plants or epiphytes. (b) Large roots growing from the stem which descend and establish themselves in the soil.—2. That which resembles a root in position or function; the part of anything that resembles the roots of a plant in manner of growth, or as a source of nourishment, support, or origin; as, the roots of a cancer, of teeth, &c. Hence, (a) the bottom or lower part of anything. 'Deep to the roots of hell.' Milton.

He putteth forth his hand upon the rock; he overturneth the mountains by the roots. Job xxviii. 9.

(b) The origin or cause of anything.

The love of money is the root of all evil. 1 Tim. vi. 10.

(c) An elementary notional syllable; that part of a word which conveys its essential meaning, as distinguished from the formative parts by which this meaning is modified; thus, true may be regarded as the root of un-tru, thi-fu, lies. (d) The first ancestor. 'The root and father of many kings.' Shak.

They were the roots out of which sprung two distinct people. Locke.

(e) In math. the root of any quantity is such a quantity as, when multiplied into itself a certain number of times, will exactly produce that quantity. Thus 2 is a root of 4, because when multiplied into itself it exactly produces 4. The power is named from the number of the factors employed in the multiplication, and the root is named from the power. Thus if a quantity be multiplied once by itself the product is called the second power or square, and the quantity itself the square root, or second root of the product; if the quantity be multiplied twice by itself we obtain the third power or cube, and the quantity is the cube root or third root; and so on. The character marking a root is $\sqrt{\quad}$, and the particular root is indicated by placing above the sign the figure which expresses the number of the root, which figure is called the index of the root. Thus $\sqrt[4]{16}$ indicates the fourth root of 16, that is 2; $\sqrt[4]{4}$ the square root of 4, that is 2, the index in the case of the square root being usually omitted. The same is the case with algebraic quantities, as $\sqrt{a^2+2ab+2ab^2+b^3} = a+b$. See POWER, INDEX, INVOLUTION, EVOLUTION. (f) In music, (1) a note which, besides its own sound, generates overtones or harmonics; (2) that note from among whose overtones any chord may be selected; (3) a note upon which, whether expressed or implied, a chord is built up; the fundamental note of a chord. (g) In old astron. any certain time taken at pleasure, from which, as an era, the celestial motions were to be computed.—3. An esculent root; a plant whose root, or whose bulbs or tubers are esculent, or the most useful part, as beets, carrots, &c.—To take root, or to strike root, to become planted or fixed, or to be established; to increase and spread.

That love took deepest root which first did grow. Dryden.
When the soil is so well prepared for its reception science will strike its root deep. Brougham.

Root (rōt), v. i. 1. To fix the root; to enter the earth, as roots.

In deep grounds the weeds root the deeper. Mortimer.

2. To be firmly fixed; to be established.

If any error chanced . . . to cause misapprehensions, he gave them not leave to root and fasten by concealment. Bp. Fell.

Root (rōt), v. t. 1. To fix by the root; to plant and fix deep in the earth; as, a tree roots itself; a deeply rooted tree.—2. To plant deeply; to impress deeply and durably; used chiefly in the participle.

Canst thou not minister to a mind diseas'd, Pluck from the memory a rooted sorrow. Shak.

The Presbyterians could never have been perfectly reconciled to the father: they had no such rooted enmity to the son. Macaulay.

Root (rōt), v. t. [Formerly also written uroot, root, from A. Sax. urōtan, urōtan, to root up; D. uroeten, Icel. rōta, Dan. rode, to root up, as with the snout; A. Sax. urōt, O. Fr. urote, a snout.] 1. To dig or burrow in with the snout; to turn up with the snout, as a swine. 'The (boar) would root these beauties as he roots the mead.' Shak.—2. To tear up or out as if by rooting; to eradicate; to extirpate; to remove or destroy utterly; to exterminate; generally with up, out, away, &c. 'To root out the whole hated family.' Shak. 'Not to destroy but root them out of heaven.' Milton.

He's a rank weed, Sir Thomas, And we must root him out. Shak.
In vain we plant, we build, our stores increase, If conscience roots up all our inward peace. Glavinville.

[The use of this word has no doubt been influenced by the entirely different word root.]

Root (rōt), v. i. To turn up the earth with the snout, as swine.

Wild dogs, and wolf, and boar, and bear, Came night and day, and rooted in the ground. Tennyson.

Root-bound (rōt'bound), a. Fixed to the earth by roots; firmly fixed, as if by the root; immovable. 'Or, as Daphne was, root-bound, that fled Apollo.' Milton.

Root-breaker, Root-bruise (rōt'brak-ér, rōt'brōz-ér), n. A machine for breaking or bruising potatoes, turnips, carrots, or other raw roots, into small or moderately-sized pieces, before giving them to cattle or horses.

Root-built (rōt'bilt), a. Built of roots.

'The root-built cell.' Shenstone.

Root-crop (rōt'krop), n. A crop of plants with esculent roots, especially of plants having single roots, as turnips, beets, &c.

Root-eater (rōt'et-ér), n. An animal that feeds on roots.

Rootedly (rôt'ed-li), adv. In a rooted manner; deeply; from the heart.

They all do hate him
As rootedly as I. Shak.

Rootedness (rôt'ed-nes), n. The state or condition of being rooted.

Rooter (rôt'ér), n. One that roots; one that tears up by the roots; one who eradicates or destroys. 'When the rooters and thorough reformers made clean work with the church, and took away all.' South.

Rootery (rôt'ér-i), n. A mound or pile formed with the roots of trees, in which plants are set as in a rockery, used as an ornamental object in gardening.

Root-hair (rôt'här), n. In bot., a slender hair-like fibre growing on roots, being a production of the epidermis of the root.

Root-house (rôt'house), n. 1. A house made of roots.—2. A house for storing up or depositing potatoes, turnips, carrots, cabbages, or other roots or tops, for the winter feed of cattle.

Root-leaf (rôt'let), n. A leaf growing immediately from the root.

Rootless (rôt'les), a. Having no root. 'A rootless tree.' Sir T. More.

Rootlet (rôt'let), n. A radicle; a little root.

Root-mildew (rôt'mil-dü), n. The name given to certain mycelia which infest the roots of peaches, apples, currants, roses, &c., causing their death.

Root-parasite (rôt-par-a-sit), n. A plant which grows upon the root of another plant, as plants of the nat. order Orobanchaceae, or broom-rape.

Root-stock (rôt'stok), n. In bot., a prostrate rooting thickened stem, which yearly produces young branches or plants; a rhizome. Ginger and orris roots are common instances of it.

Rooty (rôt'i), a. Full of roots; as, rooty ground. Chapman.

Rooye-bok (rô'ye-bok), n. [D. rooijen, to regulate, to order, and bok, buck—from their habit of walking straight forward in single file.] A handsome antelope of South Africa, Eryceros melampus, measuring 3 feet in height, and having elegantly shaped ringed horns and a beautiful tinted bay coat. A black semicircular mark on the croup, and the jet black hue of the black of its feet, afford easy means of distinguishing it from other antelopes. Called also Pallah.

Ropalac (rô-pal'ik), a. [Gr. rhopalon, a club.] 1. Club-formed; increasing or swelling toward the end.—2. Relating to poetical verses in which the words succeed each other in a regularly increasing number of syllables.

Rope (rôp), n. [Formerly also rop, rop, rape; A. Sax. râp, Sc. raip, Icel. reip, D. reep, roop, G. reif, Goth. raips.] 1. A cord of some thickness; a general name applied to cordage over 1 inch in circumference. Ropes are usually made of hemp, flax, cotton, coir, or other vegetable fibre, or of iron, steel, or other metallic wire. A hempen rope is composed of a certain number of yarns or threads which are first spun or twisted into strands, and the finished rope goes under special names according to the number and arrangement of the strands of which it is composed. A hawser-laid rope is composed of three strands twisted left-hand, the yarn being laid up right-hand. A cable-laid rope consists of three strands of hawser-laid rope twisted right-hand; called also water-laid, or right-hand rope. A shroud-laid rope consists of a central strand slightly twisted, and three strands twisted around it; called also four-strand rope. A flat rope usually consists of a series of hawser-laid ropes placed side by side and fastened together by sewing in a zigzag direction. Wire ropes generally consist of six strands laid or spun around a hempen core, each strand consisting of six wires laid the contrary way around a smaller hempen core.—2. A row or string consisting of a number of things united; as, a rope of onions; a rope of pearls.—Rope's end, the end of a rope; a short piece of rope, often used as an instrument of punishment.—Rope of sand, proverbially, a feeble union or tie; a band easily broken.—Upon the high ropes, (a) elated; in high spirits. (b) haughty; arrogant. Scot. To give a person rope, to let him go on without check.

Rope (rôp), v.t. pret. & pp. roped; ppr. roping. To be drawn out or extended into a filament or thread by means of any glutinous or adhesive quality.

Such bodies partly follow the touch of another body, and partly stick to themselves, and therefore rope and draw themselves in threads, as pitch, glue, and birdlime. Bacon.

Rope (rôp), v.t. 1. To draw by or as by a rope; to fasten or tie up with a rope or ropes; as, to rope a bale of goods.—2. To pull or curb in; to restrain, as a horse by its rider to prevent it winning a race; a not uncommon trick on the turf.

The bold yeomen, in full confidence that their fav. write will not be roped, back their opinions manfully for crowns. Lawrence.

Rope-band (rôp'band), See ROBBIN.

Rope-bark (rôp'bark), n. A shrub (Dirca palustris) growing in low wet places, as boggy woods, in the United States. Called otherwise Swamp-wood, Leather-wood, Moose-wood.

Rope-dancer (rôp'dans-ér), n. One who walks, dances, or performs acrobatic feats on a rope extended at a greater or less height above the floor or ground. 'A darling rope-dancer, whom they expect to fall every moment.' Addison.

Rope-dancing (rôp'dans-ing), n. The act or profession of a rope-dancer. Arbuthnot.

Rope-ladder (rôp'lád-ér), n. A ladder made of ropes.

Rope-maker (rôp'mák-ér), n. One whose occupation is to make ropes or cordage.

Rope-making (rôp'mák-ing), n. The art or business of manufacturing ropes or cordage.

Rope-mat (rôp'mat), n. A mat made of oakum.

Ropen, pp. of rope or reap. Reaped. Chaucer.

Rope-porter (rôp'pört-ér), n. A pulley mounted on a frame, over which the ropes of steam-ploughs are borne off the ground so as to prevent wear and tear from friction.

Rope-pump (rôp'pump), n. A machine for raising water, consisting of an endless rope or ropes passing over a pulley fixed at the place to which the water is to be raised, and under another pulley fixed below the surface of the water. The upper pulley being turned rapidly by a winch, motion is given to the rope, and the water rises up along with the ascending part of the rope, partly by the momentum it acquires when in motion, and partly by capillary attraction.

Roper (rôp'ér), n. 1. A rope-maker.—2. One who ropes goods; a packer.

In bot. an elongated receptacle with the styles adhering; also applied generally to any rigid process of remarkable length, or to any additional process at the end of any of the parts of a plant.—8. In entom. the beak or suctorial organ formed by the appendages of the mouth in certain insects. H. A. Nicholson.

Rosula (rō'zū-lā), n. (Dim. of L. rosa, a rose.) A small rose; a rosette.

Rosulate (rō'zū-lāt), a. In bot. having the leaves arranged in little rose-like clusters.

Rosy (rō'zī), a. 1. Resembling a rose in colour or qualities; red; blushing; blooming. 'A smile that glowed celestial rosy red.' Milton. 'The rosy morn.' Waller.

Her lily hand her rosy cheek lies under,
Cozening the pillow of a lawful kiss. Shak.

2. Made in the form of a rose. 'His rosy ties and garter so o'erblown.' B. Jonson.

Rosy-bosomed (rō'zī-bō-zūm-d), a. Having the bosom of a rosy colour or filled with roses. 'The rosy-bosom'd hours.' Gray.

Rosy-coloured (rō'zī-kul-ērd), a. Having the colour of a rose. 'Rosy-coloured Helen.' Dryden.

Rosy-cross (rō'zī-kros), n. The red cross of the Rosicrucians.—Knights of the Rosy-cross, Rosicrucians (which see).

Rosy-crowned (rō'zī-kround), a. Crowned with roses. Gray.

Rosy-drop (rō'zī-drop), a. Carbuncled face, an eruption of small suppurating tubercles, with shining redness and an irregular granular appearance of the skin of the part of the face which is affected, often produced by hard drinking; grog-blossoms; brandy-face.

Rosy-fingered (rō'zī-fing-gērd), a. Having rosy fingers; borrowed from Homer's favourite epithet of the Dawn.

Rosy-kindled (rō'zī-kin-dīd), a. Suffused with a rosy colour; blushing.

Her bright hair blown about the serious face,
Yet rosy-kindled with her brother's kiss. Tennyson.

Rosy-tinted (rō'zī-tīnt-ed), a. Having rose-tints. 'In tufts of rosy-tinted snow.' Tennyson.

Rot (rōt), v. i. pret. & pp. rotted; ppr. rotting. [A. Sax. rotian, D. rotten, to rot; Ice. rotia, to rot, to decay, rotinn, rotten.]

1. To decompose; to become putrid; to putrefy; to go to decay. 'The bodies of the animals would suddenly corrupt and rot.' Woodward.—2. Fig. to decay morally; to moulder; to rust. 'If man rot in dreamless ease.' Tennyson.

Wither, poor girl, in your garret; rot, poor bachelor, in your club. Thackeray.

SYN. To putrefy, corrupt, decay, spoil.

Rot (rōt), v. t. 1. To make putrid; to cause to be decomposed by natural operations; to bring to corruption; as, to rot hay with moisture.—2. To cause to take rot, as sheep.

Bakewell, when his sheep were past service, used to rot them purposely by feeding them on wet land, that they might not pass into other hands. Brande & Cox.

3. To expose to a process of partial rotting, as flax; to rot.—4. Used in the imperative as a sort of imprecation, like hang, confound, &c.; as, rot it.

'What are they fear'd on? fools! 'od rot 'em!' Were the last words of Higginbottom. H. Smith.

Rot (rōt), n. 1. The process of rotting; putrid decay; putrefaction.—2. A fatal distemper incident to sheep, and sometimes affecting other animals, the immediate cause of the mortality being a great number of small animals, called flukes (Distoma hepaticum, see DISTOMA), found in the liver, and developed from germs swallowed with their food. The disease is promoted also by a humid state of atmosphere, soil and herbage. It has different degrees of rapidity, but is always fatal at last; and the treatment of it is seldom successful, unless when early commenced, or when it is of a mild nature. 3. A disease very injurious to the potato; the potato disease. See under POTATO.—4. Nonsense; trash; bosh. [Slang.]

Crop, on the other hand, was evidently a beast who thought geniality, sympathy, and affection all 'rot.' Stuart Glennie.

—White rot, hydrocotyle, a small herb belonging to the nat. order Umbellifere; pennywort; sheep-rot.

Rota (rō'tā), n. [L. rota, a wheel (whence rotate, rotary, &c.). Comp. G. rad, a wheel; W. rhod, a wheel, rhedu, to run.] 1. An ecclesiastical court of Rome, composed of twelve prelates. It takes cognizance of all suits by appeal, and of all matters, beneficiary and patrimonial.—2. In Eng. hist. a name given to a political club founded by Harrington, the author of Oceana, in 1659, who advocated the election of the great officers of state by ballot, and the retirement of a certain number of members of parliament annually by rotation.—3. A school-roll. 'The senior tag who kept the rota.' T. Hughes.—4. A roll or list showing the order in which individuals are to be taken in turn; as, the regiment first on the rota for foreign service.

Rotacism (rō'tā-sizm), n. [Gr. rotakismos.] Faulty pronunciation of the letter R, a species of psellismus; burr. It is produced by trilling the extremity of the soft palate against the back part of the tongue.

Rota-club (rō'tā-klub), n. In Eng. hist. see ROTA, 2.

Rotate (rō'tē-form), a. [L. rota, a wheel, and forma, shape.] In bot. same as Rotate.

Rotal (rō'tāl), a. Rotary; pertaining to circular or rotatory motion. [Rare.]

Rotalla (rō'tā'llā), n. A genus of the Foraminifera, so called from their nautiloid wheel-like contour. They are extremely minute, and are found fossil in the lias, oolite, and chalk in immense numbers and many species, and still swarm in the present sea. Called also Rotallites.

Rotary (rō'tā-ri), a. [From L. rota, a wheel.] Turning, as a wheel on its axis; pertaining to rotation; rotatory; as, rotary motion.—Rotary engine. See under ROTATORY.—Rotary pump. See under PUMP.

Rotascope (rō'tā-skōp), n. [L. rota, a wheel, and Gr. skopos, to see.] Same as Gyroscope.

Rotate (rō'tāt), a. [L. rotatus, pp. of roto, to turn, from rota, a wheel.] In bot. wheel-shaped, monopetalous, spreading nearly flat, without any tube, or expanding into a nearly flat border, with scarcely any tube; as, a rotate corolla or calyx.

Rotate (rō'tāt), v. i. [L. rotare, rotatum, to turn round, from rota, a wheel.] 1. To revolve or move round a centre; to turn round, as a wheel.—2. To do anything, as to discharge a function or office, in rotation; to leave office and be succeeded by another.

Rotate (rō'tāt), v. t. pret. & pp. rotated; ppr. rotating. To cause to turn round like a wheel.

Rotate-plane, Rotato-plane (rō'tāt-plān, rō'tā'tō-plān), a. In bot. wheel-shaped and flat, without a tube; as, a rotate-plane corolla.

Rotation (rō'tā-shon), n. [L. rotatio, rotationis, from roto, to turn; rota, a wheel.]

1. The act of rotating or turning, or state of being whirled round; the motion of a solid body, as a wheel or sphere, about an axis, as distinguished from the progressive motion of a body revolving round another body or a distant point. Thus the daily turning of the earth on its axis is a rotation; its annual motion round the sun is a revolution.—Axis of rotation, the axis or line about which a rotating body turns.—Principal axes of rotation. If a point, which is not the centre of gravity, be taken in a solid body, all the axes which pass through that point (and they may be infinite in number) will have different moments of inertia, and there must exist one in which the moment is a maximum, and another in which it is a minimum. Those axes in respect of which the moment of inertia is a maximum or minimum are called the principal axes of rotation. In every body, however irregular, there are three principal axes of rotation, at right angles to each other, on any one of which, when the body revolves, the opposite centrifugal forces counterbalance each other, and hence the rotation becomes permanent.—Centre of rotation, the point about which a body revolves. It is the same as the centre of motion.—Centre of spontaneous rotation, the point about which a body, all whose parts are at liberty to move, and which has been struck in a direction not passing through its centre of gravity, begins to turn. If any force is impressed upon a body or system of bodies, in free space, and not in a direction passing through the centre of gravity of the body or system, a rotatory motion will ensue about an axis passing through the centre of gravity, and the centre about which this motion is performed is called the centre of spontaneous rotation.—Angular velocity of rotation. When a solid body revolves about an axis its different particles move with a velocity proportional to their respective distances from the axis, and the velocity of the particle whose distance from the axis is unity is the angular velocity of rotation.—2. A peculiar spiral movement of fluids observed within the cavity of certain vegetable cells, as in Chara and Vallisneria.—3. A return or succession in a series; established succession; specifically, (a) the course by which officers or others leave their places at certain times, and are succeeded by others; as, the members of the directorate retire by rotation. (b) In agri and hort. a recurring series of different crops grown on the same ground; the order of recurrence in cropping. It is found that the same annual crop cannot be advantageously cultivated on the same soils for more than one or two years, and hence one kind of crop is made to succeed another. But as the number of cultivated crops is limited, when the whole course has been gone through once it is again repeated; and hence the origin of the word rotation as applicable to crops. Different soils and climates require different systems of rotation, but it is a recognized rule in all cases that culmiferous crops ripening their seeds should not be repeated without the intervention of pulse, roots, herbage, or fallow.

The steward's books show what rents were paid and forgiven, what crops were raised, and in what rotation. Thackeray.

Rotational (rō'tā-shon-al), a. Pertaining to rotation.

If a body on the earth's surface . . . be urged by a force acting along a meridian it will . . . outrun the earth, or fall behind it, according as its original rotational velocity was greater or less than those of the places to which it comes. Prof. Everett.

Rotative (rō'tā-tiv), a. Turning, as a wheel; rotatory. [Rare.]

Rotato-plane, a. See ROTATE-PLANE.

Rotator (rō'tā-ter), n. [L.] That which rotates or causes rotation; that which gives a circular or rolling motion; especially, a muscle producing a rolling motion, as the muscles of the two apophyses in the upper part of the thigh-bone.

Rotatoria (rô-ta-tô-ri-a), n. pl. [L. rota, a wheel.] A section of infusorial animals. See ROTIFERA.

Rotatory (rô-ta-to-ri), n. One of the Rotatoria; a wheel-animalcule. See ROTIFER.

Rotatory (rô-ta-to-ri), a. (From rotate; Fr. rotatoire.) 1. Pertaining to or consisting in rotation; characterized by rotation; exhibiting rotation; rotary; as, rotatory movements.
The ball-and-socket joint allows a rotatory or sweeping motion.

2. Going in a circle; following in succession; as, rotatory assemblies. Burke.—Rotatory or rotary steam-engine, an engine in which the piston rotates in the cylinder or the cylinder upon the piston, without the intervention of reciprocating parts. In the majority of cases in which the steam-engine is used as a source of power it is for the production of motion in the state referred to, and it has been naturally inferred by many that by simply causing the steam to act directly upon surfaces rigidly connected with the shaft to be set in motion the most powerful effect would be produced, and in the most economical manner. As yet, however, no rotatory engine has been constructed which has proved more economical than the reciprocating engine with crank attached.—Rotatory muscle, a rotator.—Rotatory polarization, the change of plane to the right or to the left which a ray of plane polarized light undergoes when passed through Iceland-spar, sugar, &c.

Rotche (roch), n. [D. rotje, a petrel; comp. Prov. G. rätsche, a duck.] The popular name of a genus of British natorial birds (Mergulus or Cephus) of the auk family (Alcidae). The common rotche (M. melanoleucus) is about the size of a large pigeon, and purely oceanic, frequenting the arctic seas, and coming to land only during the breeding season. It is rare in Britain. Called also Little Auk, Sea Dove, and Greenland Dove.

Rotchet (roch'et), n. The old name of a kind of fish. See ROCHET.

Roté (rô-té), n. [O. Fr. rote, L. L. rota, rotta, chrotta, from the Celtic; W. cruth, E. crowd, a fiddle.] An old stringed musical instrument, a kind of harp, lute, guitar, or viol. One variety is said to have been played with a wheel; a sort of hurdy-gurdy. 'The faire Poems playing on a rote.' Spenser. 'Worthy of great Phoebus' rote.' Spenser.

Roté (rô-té), n. [O. Fr. rote, a way, a route; hence rotine, rote, routine. See ROUTE.] 1. Frequent repetition of words or sounds without attending to the signification or to principles and rules; mere effort of memory; generally or always in the phrase by rote, by heart, by memory merely; as, to learn a lesson by rote. 'Rehearse your song by rote.' Shak. 'Active tabbling by rote.' Carlyle.

Take hackney jokes from Miller got by rote,
With just enough of learning to misquote. Byron.

2. A part mechanically committed to memory. 'A rote of buffoonery that serveth all occasions.' Swift.

Rotet (rô-té), v. t. pret. & pp. rotet; ppr. rotating.
1. To learn by rote or by heart. Shak.—
2. To repeat from memory. 'If by chance a tune you rote.' Drayton.

Rote (rô-té), n. t. To go out by rotation or succession. [Rare.]

A third part of the senate or parliament should rote out by ballot every year, and new ones be chosen in their room. Zachary Grey.

Rote, t n. 1. A root.—2. In astrol. see ROOT. Chaucer.

Rote (rô-té), n. [O. E. and Sc. route, rout, A. Sax. Arutan, Icel. rauta, to roar.] The roaring of the sea as it breaks in surf on the shore. 'The sea's rote.' Mir. for Magna.

Rot-gut (rô-t'gut), n. Bad beer or spirituous liquor of any kind. Harvey.

Rother, t n. The rudder of a ship. Chaucer.

Rother (rô-thér), a. [A. Sax. Rryther, a bovine animal.] Bovine.—Rother beasts, cattle of the bovine genus; black cattle. Golding.

Rother-nail (rô-thér-nâil), n. [That is, rudder-nail.] In ship-building, a nail with a very full head, used for fastening the rudder-irons of ships.

Rother-soll (rô-thér-soll), n. The dung of rother beasts.

Rothofite (rô'tof-it), n. A variety of garnet, brown or black, found in Sweden.

Rotifer (rô'ti-fér), n. One of the Rotifera.

Rotifera (rô-ti-fér-a), n. pl. [L. rota, a wheel, and fero, to carry.] A class of animalcules, usually classified with the lowest worms or Scolecida, distinguished by their circles of cilia, sometimes single, sometimes double, which, through the microscope, appear like revolving wheels, whence they have been called wheel animalcules. The rotifers can be delectated and kept in a dry and parched state for months and still be revived on the application of moisture. Called also Rotatoria.

Rotiform (rô'ti-form), a. [L. rota, a wheel, and forma, shape.] 1. Shaped like a wheel. 2. In bot. same as Rotate.

Rotondo (rô-ton'dô), a. [It.] In music, round; full.

Rotta (rô'ta), n. An old musical instrument; a rote.

The rebek, or lute-stringed instrument, with one or three strings; the crouch, or long-box-shaped instrument with six or more strings (in both these the strings are supported by bridges and played with bows as in the violin); and lastly, the rota, or kind of guitar, without a bridge or bow, and played by the fingers. H. R. Harris.

Rottboellia (rot-bô-ell'i-a), n. A genus of grasses, named from Rottbôll, a professor in Copenhagen. See HARD-GRASS.

Rotten (rô'tn), a. [A Scandinavian word, and not from the verb to rot; Icel. rotinn, Sw. rullen, rotten, a participle of an old verb now lost.] 1. Putrid; decaying; decomposed by the natural process of decay; as, a rotten plank. 'You survive when I in earth am rotten.' Shak.—2. Unsound; defective in principle; treacherous; deceitful; corrupt. 'Base and rotten policy.' Shak. 'Their rotten privilege and custom.' Shak.

Something is rotten in the state of Denmark. Shak.

3. Yielding below the feet; not sound or hard. 'The deepness of the rotten way.' Knolles.

'Bridges laid over bogs and rotten moors.' Milton. 4. Fetid; ill smelling.

'Rotten dews.' Shak. 'Reek of the rotten fen.' Shak.—Rotten borough, a name given, previous to the passing of the Reform Bill of 1832, to certain boroughs in England which had fallen into decay and had a mere handful of voters, but which still retained the privilege of sending members to Parliament. At the head of the list of these stood Old Sarum, which returned two members though without a single inhabitant, the proprietors nominating whom they pleased.—Syn. Putrefied, putrid, decayed, carious, defective, unsound, corrupt, deceitful, treacherous.

Rotten (rô'tn), n. [Fr. raton.] A rat. [Scotch.]

Rottenly (rô'tn-ly), adv. In a rotten manner; fetidly; putridly; unsoundly; defectively.

Rottenness (rô'tn-ness), n. State of being rotten, decayed, or putrid; cariousness; putrefaction; unsoundness. Prov. xiv. 30.

Rotten-stone (rô'tn-stôn), n. A soft stone or mineral, called also Tripoli, or Terra Tripolitana, from the country from which it was formerly brought. It is much used for polishing household articles of brass or other metal. Most of the rotten-stone of commerce is derived, like that of Derbyshire, from the decomposition of siliceous limestones, the lime being decomposed, and the silica remaining as a light earthy mass.

Rotlera (rô'tê-ra), n. [In honour of Dr. Rotler, a Danish missionary.] A genus of handsome bushes or moderately sized trees, found in the warmer parts of Australia, the tropical parts of Asia, and throughout India; nat. order Euphorbiaceæ. R. tetracocos yields a hard and valuable timber. The capsules of R. tinctoria are covered with short stiff hairs, which, when rubbed off, have the appearance of a powder of a fine red colour, which is employed in India in dyeing silk of a rich orange colour of great beauty and extreme stability.

Rottolo (rô'tô-lô), n. A weight used in parts of the Mediterranean. In Aleppo the ordinary rottolo is nearly 5 lbs., that for weighing silk, however, varies from 1½ lb. to 1¼ lb. In Malta it equals 1 lb. 12 oz. avoirdupois.

Rotula (rô'tu-la), n. [L. dim. of rota, a wheel.] In anat. the knee-pan; the patella.

Rotular (rô'tu-lêr), a. [See above.] In anat. relating to or appertaining to the patella or knee-cap.

Roulette (rō-lēt), n. [Fr., properly a little wheel, a castor, from rouler, to roll.] 1. A game of chance, played at a table, in the centre of which is a cavity surmounted by a revolving disc, the circumference of which is divided generally into thirty-eight compartments coloured black and red alternately, and numbered 1 to 36, with a zero and double zero. The person in charge of the table (the banker or tailleur) sets the disc in motion, and causes a ball to revolve on it in an opposite direction; after two or three revolutions the ball drops into one of the compartments, thus determining the winning number or colour. The players, of which there may be any number, may stake on a figure, group of figures, even or odd number, or on the black or red. Should the player stake on a single figure and be successful, he wins thirty-six times his stake. The amount varies should he be successful on the other chances. — 2. A tool used by engravers for producing dotted work. It consists of a small wheel having finely-pointed teeth, which, being rolled along the surface, produce a series of indented impressions on the metal-plate. A similar instrument is used in mechanical drawing, and in plotting. It is dipped into India-ink, so that the points impress a dotted line as the wheel is passed over the paper.

Round (rōm), a. Wide; spacious. Chaucer.

Roumanssch, n. See ROMANSCH.

Round, Rowin (roun), v. t. [A. Sax. rūnian, to whisper in the ear, from rūn, a rune, a mystery. The word often assumed the form round.] To whisper.

The bold King Arthur sleepeth sound;
So sleep the knights that gave that Round
Old Table such éclat!
Heed.

—Round number is a number that ends with a cipher, and may be divided by 10 without a remainder; a number not exact, but near enough the truth to serve the particular purpose.—Round turn (naut.), the passing of a rope once round a timber-head, &c., so that it may hold on.—SYN. Circular, spherical, globular, globose, orbicular, orb, cylindrical, full, plump, rotund.

Round (round), n. 1. That which is round, as a circle, a sphere, a globe. 'With rounds of waxen tapers on their heads.' Shak.

As these white robes are sold and dark,
To yonder shining ground,
As this pale taper's earthly spark,
To yonder argent round.
Tennyson.

2. The act of going or passing round, as round a circle or company; as, the joke made the round of the table; hence, the aggregate of similar acts done successively by each of a number of persons and coming back to where the series began; thus, the playing of a card each, by a company at table, is a round, so also the drinking of a toast by all the company present is a round of toasts.

Women to cards may be compared; we play
A round or two; when used, we throw away.
Gray.
The feast was served; the bowl was round;
To the king's pleasure went the mirthful round.
Pratt.

3. A series of events or duties which come back to the point of commencement; a constantly recurring series of events; as, a round of parties, of labours, &c.

Centuries glide away in the same unvaried round of cabals at court.
Brougham.

The trivial round, the common task,
May furnish all we ought to ask—
Room to deny ourselves, a road
To bring us, daily, nearer God.
Kebble.

Dryden.

6. A walk or circuit performed by a guard or an officer among the sentinels, or through the various parts of a military station, to see that the sentinels are faithful, and all things safe; hence, the officer and men who perform this duty. The term is also applied to the walk or beat of a person who habitually goes over the same ground, as of a policeman, postman, milkman, costermonger, and the like.—7. A short musical composition in which three or more voices starting at the beginning of stated successive phrases, sing the same music (in unison or octave), the combination of all the parts producing correct harmony. In construction it does not differ from the catch, but the words of the latter should be always amusing, while those of a round may be sacred.—8. A roundelay; a song.—Fairfax.—9. A dance in which the performers are arranged in a ring or circle.

Knit your hands and beat the ground,
In a light fantastic round.
Milton.

10. Milit. (a) a general discharge of firearms by a body of troops, in which each soldier fires once. (b) Ammunition for firing once; as, to supply a regiment with a single round or with twelve rounds of cartridges; a soldier has sixty rounds with him.—11. In the manege, a volt or circular tread.—12. That part of a pugilistic encounter extending from the commencement till a halt is called by reason of one of the combatants being thrown or knocked down, or falling, or between one halt and another; the time during which the combatants keep pounding each other in one bout.—13. Its Transactions, the publication of which began in 1665, and has been regularly continued since, contain perhaps the most valuable repository of scientific research in existence. A somewhat similar society, the Royal Society of Edinburgh, for the investigation and discussion of subjects in science, art, and literature, was founded in 1783.—Royal standard. See STANDARD.—Royal, Regal, Kingly. Regal is a more abstract epithet than royal, and of more general application. It is applied primarily to what pertains to a king in virtue of his office; hence, to what becomes a king, or what is suggestive of a king, and as now frequently used is nearly synonymous with princely, magnificent; as, regal state, regal power, regal pomp. Royal is of narrower application, and denotes what pertains to the king as an individual, or is associated with his person; as, his royal highness; the royal family; the royal presence; the royal robes; a royal salute. It does not, like regal, necessarily imply magnificence. Thus a royal residence may not be regal in its character, while on the other hand any magnificent mansion belonging to a subject may be described as regal, though it is not royal. The sway of a great Highland chief of old was regal, but not royal. Kingly seems to be intermediate. It signifies literally like a king, hence proper to or becoming a king, and in its more general use resembling or suggestive of a king. Like royal it has reference to personal qualities, as a kingly bearing, presence, disposition, and the like, while like regal it is not restricted to the monarch or members of his house.—SYN. Kingly, regal, monarchical, imperial, kinglike, princely, august, majestic, superb, splendid, magnificent, illustrious, noble, magnanimous.

Royal (roi'al), n. 1. Paper of a size 24 inches by 19 inches, or for printing purposes 25 inches by 20 inches. Rubia (rû-bi-a), n. [L. rubia, madder, from rubere, red—in allusion to the colour obtained from the roots.] A genus of plants found both in Europe and Asia, belonging to the nat. order Eubiaceae. They are perennial herbs often woody below, with whorled entire leaves and small yellowish flowers. Several species are employed in medicine.

and also in the ash, for the sake of the colouring matter which is contained in the roots. R. tinctorum is the well known madder plant. (See Madder.) The root of R. erythraea yields the madder of India. See Madder.

Rubiacina (rū-bi-ā-si-nā), a. pl. A large natural order of exogenous plants, comprising the orders Cinchona and Gallaceae, and including all monocotyledonous plants with opposite leaves, interpetiolar stipules, stamens inserted in the tube of the corolla and alternating with its lobes, and an inferior compound ovary.

Rubiacina (rū-bi-ā-si-nā), a. (C₁₀H₁₆O₄) A yellow crystallisable colouring matter found in madder root.

Rubian, Rubiane (rū-bi-ān), a. (C₁₀H₁₆O₄) The bitter principle and colour-producing matter of madder. On trying to dye with rubian in the usual manner the mordants assume only the faintest shades of colour. If, however, the watery solution be mixed with sulphuric or acetic acid and boiled it gradually deposits a quantity of insoluble yellow floccs, which, after being separated by filtration and well washed, are found to dye the same colours as those obtained by means of madder. In fact, these floccs contain alizarine, to which they owe their tinctorial power.

Rubican (rū-bi-kan), a. [Fr. from L. ruber, to be red.] A term applied to the colour of a bay, sorrel, or black horse, with light-gray or white upon the flanks, but the gray or white not predominant there.

Rubicon (rū-bi-kon), a. A small river which separated Italy from Cisalpine Gaul, the province allotted to Julius Cæsar. The crossing of this river by Cæsar was the first step in the civil war between him and Pompey, and was equivalent to a declaration of war. Hence the phrase to pass or cross the Rubicon signifies to take a decisive step in an enterprise, or to adopt a measure from which one cannot or will not recede.

Rubund (rū-bi-und), a. [L. rubundus, from rubus, to be red.] Inclining to redness, ruddy, blood-red and especially of the face. 'Plato's rubund nose.' Deane.

Rubundity (rū-bi-und-i-tē), a. The state of being rubund, redness.

I do not wish you to parade your rubundity and gray hairs. H. Walpole

Rubidium (rū-bi-dī-um), a. [L. rubidus, red.] Sym. Rb., at wt. 85.4. A metal belonging to the group of elements which likewise includes lithium, sodium, potassium, and cesium. It was discovered by Kirchhoff and Bunsen, in 1860, by the method of spectral analysis. Its spectrum is chiefly distinguished by two bright red lines situated beyond the line A, hence the name. Rubidium was first detected, together with cesium, in the mineral water of Dürkheim, in which it exists to the amount of two parts in ten million. It has since been found in large quantity, together with cesium and lithium, in several other saline waters and most abundantly in that of Bourbonne les Bains. It is also found in several lepidolites, that of Rosina, in Moravia, contains 0.24 per cent rubidium, with only a trace of cesium; that of Hebron, in the state of Maine, 0.24 per cent rubidium and 0.3 per cent cesium. The two metals likewise occur, though in smaller quantity, in the lepidolite of Prague, the petalite of Uto in Finland, the lithia-mica of Zinnwald in Bohemia, and other lithia minerals. It has been found also in the ashes of many plants, and in the salts or crude potash obtained from the residues of the beetroot-sugar manufacture. It has been found in tobacco leaves, in coffee, tea, cocoa, and crude tartar. In minerals and mineral waters rubidium and cesium are always associated with lithium, and generally also with potassium and sodium, but plants have the power of assimilating two or three of these metals to the exclusion of the rest, thus tea, coffee, and the salts of beet-root contain potassium, sodium, and rubidium, but not a trace of lithium.

Rubid (rū-bid), a. Red as a ruby, as, a rubid lip, rubid sector. Shaks

How is one to tell of the rounded bosoms of furred and beaming green,—the starved divisions of rubid bloom, now-faded, as if the Black Spirits could spin purplest as we do them? Shaks

Rubile (rū-bilē), a. [L. rubus, red, and facio, to make.] Making red; as, rubile rays. Owen

Rub-stone (rū-bi-stōn), a. A stone, usually some kind of sandstone, used to sharpen instruments a whetstone, a rub. Tusser

Rubus (rū-bus), a. [L. from rubus, to be red—in reference to the colour of the fruit of some of the species.] A genus of plants, nat. order Rosaceae, sub-order Rosae. The species, which consist of shrubs, are universally diffused over the mountainous and temperate regions of the Old and New World. Several are cultivated both as ornaments and on account of their agreeable acid and astringent fruit. They have alternate simple or compound leaves and white or red flowers. There are about a hundred species, among which are the British R. idæus, or raspberry, R. fruticosus, or common bramble, R. cuneatus, or stone-bramble or rosebush-berry; and R. Chamaemorus, mountain-bramble or cloudberry

Ruby (rū-bi), a. [Fr. rubis (a silent), Fr. rubis, Sp. rubí, rubin, from L. rubinus, a carbuncle, from L. rubrus, red, reddish, ruber, red.] 1. A crystallized gem next to the diamond in hardness and value, found chiefly in the sand of rivers in Ceylon, Pegu, and Mysore. It is of various shades of red, but the most highly prized varieties are the crimson and carmine red. Among lapidaries the scarlet-coloured is sometimes called spinel ruby; the pale or rose-red, balas ruby; and the yellowish-red, rubicells. The ruby is a modification of the corundum. (See CORUNDUM.) It consists of nearly pure alumina with small quantities of magnesia, &c. — 2. Redness, red colour

You can behold such sights,
And keep the central ruby of your cheeks,
While mine are bleached with tears. Shaks

3. Something resembling a ruby; a blain, a blotch, a carbuncle — 4. Rue (ró), n. [Fr. rue, from L. ruta, from Gr. rutē, rue.] A strong-scented plant of the genus Ruta, nat. order Rutaceæ. The species are suffrutescent herbaceous plants, with alternate exstipulated pinnated or decoumpound leaves, covered with pellucid dots. Comparatively few of them are known or cultivated. R. graveolens, or common rue, sometimes called herb-grace, has been used from time immemorial, along with rosemary, as an emblem of remembrance.

and grace, on account of its evergreen foliage. Other authorities connect the name 'herb-grace' (or as Shakespeare has it 'herb of grace') with the ancient use of the plant as a disinfectant, in exorcising evil spirits, or in sprinkling the people with holy water. Jeremy Taylor, for instance, speaks of exorcists being about to 'try the devil by holy water, incense, sulphur, and rue, which from thence, as we suppose, came to be called 'herb of grace.' The stemens are remarkable for their presenting an instance of vegetable irritability. Every part of it is marked by transparent dots filled with volatile oil, which is obtained from it by distillation. The odour of rue is very strong and disagreeable, and the taste acrid and bitter. It possesses powerful stimulant, antispasmodic, and tonic properties, and when judiciously used is very serviceable in hysteria and other convulsive disorders.

Here in this place

I'll set a bank of rue, sour herb of grace.

As, even for rue, here shortly shall be seen.

In the remembrance of a weeping queen. Shak.

Rueful (rū'fūl), a. 1. Causing to rue or lament; woful; mournful; sorrowful, to be lamented. 'Spur them to rueful work.' Shak. — 2. Expressing sorrow; suggesting sorrow or melancholy, pitiful. 'Two rueful figures with long black cloaks.' Sir W. Scott.

Ruleable (rô'a-bl), a. 1. Capable of being ruled; governable. — 2. Subject to rule; accordant to rule. Bacon.

Rule (rôl), n. [O.E. reule, reule, from O.Fr. reule, reule (Mod. Fr. regle), from L. regula, a straight piece of wood, a ruler, a rule, pattern, or model (whence regular), from rego, to keep or lead in a straight line. See REGAL, also RIGHT.] 1. Government; sway; empire; control; supreme command or authority.

A wise servant shall have rule over a son that causeth shame. Prov. xvii. 2.

And his stern rule the groaning land obey'd. Pope.

2. That which is established as a principle, standard, or guide for action; that by which any procedure is to be adjusted or regulated, or to which it is to be conformed; that which is settled by authority or custom for guidance and direction; as, (a) an established mode or course of proceeding prescribed in private life.

A rule which you do not apply is no rule at all. J. M. Mason.

A rule that relates even to the smallest part of our life, is of great benefit to us, merely as it is a rule. Law.

Hence, (1) a line of conduct; behaviour.

If you prized my lady's favour at any thing more than contempt, you would not give means for this un-civil rule. Shak.

(2) Method; regularity; propriety of behaviour.

He cannot buckle his distemper'd cause Within the belt of rule. Shak.

(b) A maxim, canon, or precept to be observed in any art or science.

For in writing what I have set about, I shall confine myself neither to his (Horace's) rules, nor to any man's rules that ever lived. Steele.

(c) In monasteries, corporations, or societies, a law or regulation to be observed by the society and its particular members; also the body of such laws or regulations; as, to live according to the rule of St. Benedict. (d) In law, a point of law settled by authority; also, the mode of procedure settled by lawful judicial authority for some court or courts of justice. Rules are either general or particular. General rules are such orders relating to matters of practice as are laid down and promulgated by the court for the general guidance of the suitors. Formerly each court of common law issued its own general rules, without much regard to the practice in the other courts; but of late the object has been to assimilate the practice in all the courts of common law. They are a declaration of what the court will do, or require to be done, in all matters falling within the terms of the rule, and they resemble in some respects the Roman edict. Particular rules are such as are confined to the particular case in reference to which they have been granted. — Rules of course, those which are drawn up by the proper officers on the authority of the mere signature of counsel; or, in some instances, as upon a judge's fiat, or allowance by the master, &c., without any signature by counsel. Rules which are not of course are grantable on the motion, either of the party actually interested, or of his counsel. — A rule to show cause, or a rule nisi, means that unless the party against whom it has been obtained shows sufficient cause to the contrary, the rule, which is conditional, will become absolute. (e) In arith. and alg. a determinate mode prescribed for performing any operation and producing a certain result; a certain prescribed series of operations, adapted to discover, from the given conditions to which an unknown number,

&c., is subjected, what that number, &c., is; as, rules for addition, subtraction, &c.; rules for practice; rules for the extraction of roots, &c. Algebraic rules are often expressed in formulae; thus, if a, b, c represent the three sides of a right-angled triangle, of which c is the hypotenuse, the formula for determining c is $c = \sqrt{a^2 + b^2}$. — Rule of three. See PROPORTION, 7. (f) In gram, an established form of construction in a particular class of words; or the expression of that form in words. Thus it is a rule in English, that s or es, added to a noun in the singular number, forms the plural of that noun; but man forms its plural men, and is an exception to the rule. 3. An instrument by which lines are drawn; also, an instrument for measuring short lengths, and performing various operations in mensuration. There are of course numerous kinds of rules adapted to their peculiar objects. A common form is the rule for making linear measurements, used by carpenters and other artificers. It is divided into inches and fractions, and is usually jointed, so that it may be folded up and carried in the pocket. Those used by some classes of artificers are, however, made in a single piece. See RULER. — Gauging rule. Same as Gauging-rod (which see). See also Parallel ruler, under PARALLEL, SLIDING-RULE. — 4. In printing, a thin plate of metal, of the same height as types, usually brass, used for separating headings, titles, the columns of type in a book, or columns of type in tabular work, &c.; also a slip of metal laid above the last line set, to facilitate placing type in the stick. — 5. In plastering, a strip of wood placed on the face of a wall as a guide to assist in keeping the plane surface. — Rule joint, a movable joint in which a tongue on one piece enters a slot in the other, and is secured by a pin or rivet. — Rule of the road, the regulation directing that a driver or rider, on passing another horse or carriage, must keep on the whip-hand of the horse or carriage. — Rule of thumb, a rule suggested by a practical rather than a scientific knowledge. — Rules of a prison, certain limits without the walls, within which prisoners in custody were sometimes allowed to live, on giving security not to escape. 'The rules of the Fleet.' Thackeray. — SYN. Government, sway, empire, control, direction, regulation, law, canon, precept, maxim, guide, order, method. Rule (rûl), v. t. pret. & pp. ruled; ppr. ruling. 1. To govern; to command; to exercise authority or dominion over; to control; to conduct; to manage; to bridge; to restrain. The characters are formed almost entirely of straight lines, either single or in composition. Various opinions are held in regard to the origin of the runes. The resemblance of some of the runic characters to the Phœnician alphabet has led some to suppose they were introduced by the Phœnicians in their trading excursions to England or the Baltic. Scandinavian and Anglo-Saxon tradition ascribes the runes to Odin. The priests kept the knowledge of the runes as much as possible a mystery, and cut them on pieces of smoothed wood, generally willow, called (in A. Sax.) run-stafas, which they used for the purposes of sorcery. Runes were inscribed on monuments, rocks, medals, rings, hilts and blades of swords, and the like. Runic monuments occur in Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Germany, Britain, and some parts of France and Spain. Three fine examples of Anglo-Saxon runic monuments occur at Bewcastle, Cressa, Cumberland; Hartlepool, Northumberland, and Ruthwell, Dumfriesshire. The earliest mention made of the runes by any writer is of the sixth century.—2. The rhymes or poetry expressed in runic characters.

In this rupial valley do the low lay eggs and breed. Edmon.

Rupert's Drop (rū'perts drop), v. A drop of glass thrown while in a state of fusion into water, and thus suddenly consolidated, taking generally a form somewhat like a tadpole. The thick end may be subjected to the smart blow of a hammer without breaking, but should the smallest part of the tail be slipped off, or the surface scratched with a diamond, the whole flies into the dust with an almost explosive force. This phenomenon is due to the state of strain in the interior of the mass of glass, caused by the sudden consolidation of the crust which is formed while the internal mass is still liquid. This tends to contract on cooling, but is prevented by the molecular forces which attach it to the crust. This philosophical toy receives its name from being invented or brought first into notice by Prince Rupert, nephew of Charles I.

Rupia (rū'pā), v. [Or rupes, Lith.] A skin disease, consisting of an eruption of small flattened and distinct vesicles, surrounded by inflamed areolæ, containing a serum, purulent, milious, or dark bloody fluid, and followed by thick, dark-coloured

Rust (rust), n. [A Sax. rust, rust, rustiness; cog. D. roest, Dan. rust, Sw. and G. rost, Icel. ryd (ryth), so called from its red colour, the root being that of red, ruddy, L. ruber, red (whence rubigo, rust), russus, reddish. See RUSSET.] 1. The red or orange-yellow coating which is formed on the surface of iron, when exposed to air and moisture. It is an oxide of iron, and in point of fact other metallic oxides may be considered as rusts of the peculiar metals on which they are formed, but the term rust in the common acceptance is limited to the red oxide or peroxide of iron. Oil-paint, varnish, plumbago, a film of caoutchouc, or a coating of tin may be employed, according to circumstances, to prevent the rusting of iron utensils.—2. A composition of iron-filings and sal-ammoniac, with sometimes a little sulphur, moistened with water and used for filling fast joints. Oxidation rapidly sets in, and the composition, after a time, becomes very hard, and takes thorough hold of the surfaces between which it is placed. A joint formed in this way is called a rust-joint.—3. That which resembles rust in appearance or effects, as (a) a parasitic fungus (Uredo rubigo seris), which attacks the leaves, glumes, stalks, &c., of cereals and grasses, showing itself in the form of orange and brown spots and blotches breaking out from the internal tissue of the plant. It is most common on barley, wheat, oats, and many pasture grasses. (b) Any foul extraneous matter; corrosive or injurious accretion or influence.

A haunted house,
That keeps the rust of murder on the walls. Tennyson.

Rust is used in some self-explanatory compound words; as, rust-coloured, rust-eaten, and the like.

Rust (rust), v. i. [From the noun.] 1. To contract or gather rust; to be oxidized.

Our armours now may rust. Dryden.

2. To assume an appearance as if coated with rust.

But when the bracken rusted on their crags,
My suit had withered. Tennyson.

3. To degenerate in idleness; to become dull by inaction.

Must I rust in Egypt, never more Appear in arms and be the chief of Greece? Dryden.

Rust (rust), v. t. 1. To cause to contract rust.

Keep up your bright swords, for the dew will rust them. Shak.

2. To impair by time and inactivity.

Rustful (rust'ful), a. Rusty; tending to produce rust; characterized by rust. 'Rustful sloth.' Quarles.

Rustic (rust'ik), a. [L. rusticus, from rus, the country.] 1. Pertaining to the country; living in or found in the country; rural; as, the rustic gods of antiquity. 'Our rustic revelry.' Shak.

walls.—Rustic work, in a building, is when the stones, &c., in the face of it are hacked or picked in holes, so as to give them a natural rough appearance. This sort of work is however now more usually called rock-work, and the term rustic is applied to masonry worked with grooves between the courses, to look like open joints, of which there are several varieties. The same term is applied to walls built of stones of different sizes and shapes. In woodwork the term is used to designate summer houses and garden furniture made from rough limbs of trees, and arranged in fanciful forms.—SYN. Rural, country, rude, unpolished, inelegant, untaught, awkward, rough, coarse, plain, unadorned, simple, artless, honest.

the S. arealis, nat. order Gramineae. It is an excellent grain which bears naked seeds on a flat ear, furnished with awns like barley. It has been cultivated from time immemorial, and is considered as coming nearer in its properties to wheat than any other grain. It is more common than wheat in many parts of the Continent, being a more certain crop, and requiring less culture and manure. It is the bread-corn of Germany and Russia. It was formerly raised in considerable quantities as a bread-corn in England, but now it is mostly sown as a green-crop for food to sheep and cattle in spring. In the Netherlands it is the chief grain from which the spirit called Hollands is distilled, and when malted it makes excellent beer. Two parts of wheat and one of rye ground together make an excellent bread. Rye straw is useless as fodder, but forms an excellent material for thatching. It is also used for stuffing horse-collars or mattresses, and for making straw hats and bonnets. The meal of rye differs from that of wheat in containing a much smaller proportion of gluten. — Spermat rye, rye affected with ergot. See KBOOT. — 2. A disease in a hawk.

Rye-grass (ri'gras), n. One of the most common of the artificial grasses, belonging to the genus Lolium. There are several varieties, some annual, others perennial; some producing a strong juicy grass, and others a small diminutive plant. In the present system of husbandry rye-grass performs a very essential part, especially the perennial sort, which, mixed with different varieties of clover and other grass-seeds, produces a rich and close herbage, which may be either mown for hay or depastured. Called also Ray-grass.

Ryke (ryk), v. i. To reach. [Scottish.]

Let me ryke up to light that tear. Burns.

Rynhope (ring'hope), n. See RHYTHMOPH.

Rynd (rynd), n. A strong piece of iron inserted in the hole in the centre of the upper and moving millstone in corn-mills. The upper end of the spindle, which passes through the nether millstone, and which is driven by the machinery, is fixed into the rynd, and thus gives motion to the upper millstone.

Ryot (ri'ot), n. [Ar. ra'iot, the governed, a subject, a peasant.] A Hindu cultivator of the soil, or peasant, who holds land under the mode of assessment termed ryotwar.

Ryotwar (ri'ot-wär), n. [Hind. See RYOT.] The stipulated arrangement in regard to rent made annually in parts of Hindustan, especially in the Madras Presidency, by government officials with the ryots or actual cultivators of the soil, without the intervention of middlemen.

Ryth (ri'th), n. A ford.

Rytina (ri'tina), n. Same as Rhythina.

S.

S, the nineteenth letter of the English alphabet, represents a hissing sound made by emitting the breath between the root of the mouth and the tip of the tongue placed just above the upper teeth. It may be reckoned among the linguals (as the tongue is essential in its pronunciation), and also among the dentals (as the teeth co-operate in producing the hissing sound). More descriptively it is classed as a sibilant, from its hissing sound. Properly speaking, two sounds belong to this character in English, the one sord, or uttered with breath merely, the other sord, or uttered with voice. The first is a mere hissing, like s soft, as in snake, his, thus; the other is a hissing accompanied by a vocal murmur, precisely like that of z, as in mouse, was, pronounced was-z. S generally has its hissing sound at the beginning of all proper English words, but in the middle and end of words its sound is to be known only by usage. In a few words it is silent, as in use and vision. S is closely allied to z, and there are many instances of its change into that letter. (See R.) In some words s is now written for a former z or z, as in miss, hence, whereas, ones. Along with a following t it forms a digraph representing a distinct sound, which, like that of sh, is comparatively modern, being a weakening of an older and stronger sound, sc (sk). This sound is now very common in English words, both initially and finally, as in shape (A Sax. scap), sheath (A Sax. scath), ship (A Sax. scip), fish (A Sax. fisc), ask (A Sax. asc), &c. Formerly sc and sp were often transposed to cs and ps; thus sc anc = anc, clasp = clasp, speed = speed. S is an exceedingly common letter in English words, both initially and finally, singly or in conjunction with other consonants. The chief initial combinations sh, shab; sh, sh. look; g, go; j, job; s, Fr. son; sg, sing; st, then; th, thin;

w, wig; wh, whig; sh, shure. — See KAT.

in which it appears are sm, sn, sp, and st (as in small, snow, spring, strong); st and sp are common also as final combinations. In some cases a final t has been tacked on to a word ending properly in s, as in amongst, midst, whilst, behest, no doubt owing to the frequency with which this combination occurs. It is often doubled, and as the second element in a combination it may appear finally after any of the consonants except ch, sh, x. One reason for its being so common is that it is the characteristic of the plural and other inflections.—In abbreviations S stands for various words; as, F.R.S. Fellow of the Royal Society; S.T.P. for Sanctus Theologiae Professor, Professor of Sacred Theology; its most common use as an abbreviation is for south; S. E. south-east; S. W. south-west, &c.—In chem. S. is the symbol for sulphur.

Saadh (sā'd), n. [Hind. sād'ha, pure.] One of an Indian sect of pure deists, whose mode of life in many respects resembles those of the Quakers.

Sabadilla (sab-a-dil'a). See CEVADILLA.

Sabman (sa-bē'an), n. Same as Sabian.

Sabnanism (sa-bē'an-izm), n. Same as Sabianism and Sabianism.

Sabsism, Sabaism (sā'bē-izm, sā'ba-izm). See SABIANISM.

Sabal (sā'bal), n. A genus of palms, natives of the tropics, and next to Chamerops the most northern genus of Palmaeae. Some of them are lofty trees, but one, the S. Palmato, is perhaps the smallest of all the palm tribe. The leaves of S. Adamsoni, as well as those of S. Palmato and S. Mexicana, are used for making hats and mats.

Sabaoth (sa-bā'oth), n. [Heb. seabōth, armies, from tebā, to assemble, to go forth to war, to fight.] 1. In Script. annies; hosts. 'The Lord of Sabaoth.' Rom. ix. 29; Jam. v. 4. 2. Erroneously used as synonymous with Sabbath. Spenser. Sacred and inspired Divinity, the Sabaoth and port of all men's labours and peregrinations. Bacon. 'A week, ayre the space between two Sabaoths.' Sir W. Scott. Sir Walter Scott adopts this old usage no doubt for artistic reasons.

Sabbathian, Sabbathian (sa-bā'thi-an), n. A member of a religious sect of the seventeenth century, followers of Sabbathius Zwi, a native of Smyrna, who declared himself to be the Messiah, who had been sent to shake off the thralldom both of Christianity and Mohammedanism from the Jews, and to convert all humanity. Remnants of the sect are still in existence in Poland and Turkey.

Sabbatarian (sab-ba-tā'ri-an), n. [From Sabbath.] 1. One who observes the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, instead of the first. A sect of Baptists are called Sabbatarians, or Seventh-day Baptists, because they maintain that the Jewish Sabbath has not been abrogated.—2. One who observes the Sabbath with extraordinary or unreasonable rigour; one careful to abstain from work or relaxation on Sunday.

We have myriads of examples in this kind, amongst those rigid Sabbatarians. Burton.

Sabbatarian (sab-ba-tā'ri-an), a. Of or belonging to Sabbatarians or their tenets or practices; pertaining to the rigid observance of the Sabbath.

The form in which this tendency shows itself in her is by a strict observance of Sabbatarian rule. Dissipation and low dresses during the week are, under her control, atoned for by three services, an evening sermon read by herself, and a perfect abstinence from any cheering employment on a Sunday. Trollope.

We almost hear Jesus call the poor beggar from the door, and bid him stand forth in the midst of the assembly, and penetrate the Sabbatarian spies by the puzzling question, 'is it lawful to do good on the sabbath day, or to do evil?' J. Martinus.

Sabbatarianism (sab-ba-tā'ri-an-izm), n. The tenet of Sabbatarians.

Sabbath (sāb'ath), n. [Heb. shabbath, rest, the day of rest.] 1. The day which God appointed to be observed as a day of rest from all secular labour or employments, and to be kept holy and consecrated to his service and worship. This was originally the seventh day of the week, and this day is still observed by the Jews and some Christians as the Sabbath. But the Christian church very early began, and still continues, to observe the first day of the week, in commemoration of the resurrection of Christ on that day. Hence it is often called the Lord's day. The heathen nations in the north of Europe dedicated the first day of the week to the sun, and hence their Christian descendants continue to call the day Sunday. Sabbath is not strictly synonymous with Sunday. Sunday is the mere name of the day; Sabbath is the name of the institution. Sunday is the Sabbath of Christians; Saturday is the Sabbath of the Jews. But in the mouths of many it is equivalent to Sunday.

Glad we returned up to the coasts of light
Ere Sabbath evening. Milton.
Hail, Sabbath! thee I hail, the poor man's day. Graham.

Sunday, however, is a word which never pollutes his mouth—it is always 'the Sabbath.' The 'desecration of the Sabbath,' as he delights to call it, is to him meat and drink. Trollope.

2. Intermision of pain or sorrow; time of rest. 'The eternal Sabbath of his rest.' Dryden.

Peaceful sleep out the sabbath of the tomb.
And wake to raptures in a life to come. Pope.

Take thy banner! May it wave
Proudly o'er the good and brave;
When the battle's distant wail
Breaks the Sabbath of our vale. Longfellow.

3. The sabbatical year among the Israelites. Lev. xxv. 4. See under SABBATIC, SABBATICAL.—Sabbath-day's journey, the distance which the Jews were permitted to travel on the Sabbath-day. It appears to have varied at different times and in different circumstances, but it was probably seldom more than the whole, or less than three-fourths, of a geographical mile. A space of 2000 ells on every side of a city belonged to it, and to go that distance beyond the walls was permitted as a Sabbath-day's journey. Smith's Dict. of the Bible.

Sabbath-breaker (sāb'ath-brāk-ēr), n. One who breaks the Sabbath; one who profanes the Sabbath by violating the laws of God or man which enjoin the religious observance of that day.

The user is the greatest Sabbath-breaker, because his plough goeth every Sunday. Bacon.

Sabbath-breaking (sāb'ath-brāk-ing), n. The act of breaking or profaning the Sabbath. Also used as an adjective: given to breaking the Sabbath.

Sabbathless (sāb'ath-less), a. Having no Sabbath; without intermission of labour. 'Sabbathless Satan.' Lamb.

Sabbatia (sab-bā'ti-a), n. [In honour of Sabbati, an Italian botanist.] A genus of North American plants, nat. order Gentianaceae. There are several species, all characterized by the possession of a pure bitter principle, on which account they are extensively used in North America in intermittent and remittent fevers, and as tonics. They are annuals or biennials, with slender stems, opposite sessile entire simple leaves, and handsome cymose-panicled white or rose-purple flowers. The species most used is S. angularis, which grows in damp wet soils in the United States, and is common in moist meadows among high grass.

Sabbatic, Sabbatical (sab-bat'ik, sab-bat'ik-al), a. [Fr. sabbatique, L. sabbaticus. See SABBATH.] Pertaining to the Sabbath; resembling the Sabbath; enjoying or bringing an intermission of labour. 'Due attendance on Sabbatic duty.' Stukeley.—Sabbatical year, in the Jewish economy, was every seventh year, in which the Israelites were commanded to suffer their fields and vineyards to rest or lie without tillage and to release debtors from their obligations.

Sabbatism (sāb'ba-tizm), n. [Gr. sabbatismos, from sabbatizo, to keep the Sabbath. See SABBATH.] Rest; intermission of labour. 'That Sabbatism or rest.' Dr. H. More.

Sabbaton (sāb'ba-ton), n. A round-toed armed covering for the foot, worn during a part of the sixteenth century.

Sabbire (sāb'bir), n. A piece of timber; a beam.

Sabeen (sā-bē'an). See SABIAN.

Sabeism (sā'bē-izm), n. The same as Sabianism.

Sabella (sa-bel'a), n. A genus of tube-inhabiting, marine articulated annelids, belonging to the order Tubicola or Cephalobranchiata. The species are large, and their fanlike branchiae or gills remarkable for their delicacy and brilliancy. The blood is of an olive-green colour. S. protula is a large and splendid species inhabiting the Mediterranean.

Sabellana (sa-bel-lā'na), n. [L. sabulum, gravel.] In geol. coarse sand or gravel.

Sabellarina (sa-bel-lā'ri-a), n. A sub-genus of Annelida or worms belonging to the order Tubicola. In this genus the tube in which the animal resides is formed of grains of sand cemented together.

Sabellian (sa-bel'i-an), a. Pertaining to the heresy of Sabellius. See SABELLIAN, n.

Sabellian (sa-bel'i-an), n. A follower of Sabellius, a philosopher of Egypt in the third century, who taught that there is one person only in the Godhead, and that the Word and Holy Spirit are only virtues, emanations, or functions of the Deity.

Sabellianism (sa-bel'i-an-izm), n. The doctrines or tenets of the Sabellians.

Saber (sā'bēr), n. American mode of spelling Sabre.

Sabia (sā'bi-a), n. A genus of plants, so called from the Indian name sabia of one of the species, and forming the type of the small order Sabiaceae. There are about ten species, natives of tropical and eastern temperate Asia. The species form ornamental climbing shrubs, with smooth, lanceolate, alternate leaves, and axillary cymes or panicles of small greenish flowers.

Sabiaceae (sā-bi-'sē-ē), n. pl. A small order of dicotyledons, distributed into four genera, of which Sabia is Asiatic, Phoxanthus and Ophicorhyn American, and Meliosma common to both the Old and New Worlds.

Sabian (sā'bi-an), n. A native or inhabitant of that part of Arabia now called Yemen, the chief city of which was called Saba. They were extensive merchants of spices, perfumes, precious stones, &c., which they imported from India.

Sabian (sā'bi-an), a. Pertaining to Saba or its inhabitants. Written also Sabean, Sabeen.

Sabian (sā'bi-an), a. [Heb. tebbē, an army or host, especially the heavenly host of the angels and the heavenly luminaries.] Pertaining to the religion and rites of the Sabians. See SABIAN, n. Written also Sabeen, Sabeen, Sabeian.

Sabian (sā'bi-an), n. [See above.] 1. A worshipper of the sun and other heavenly bodies.—2. One of an obscure sect, who mingled Christianity, Judaism, Mohammedanism, and heathenish superstition together. Adherents of this sect, inappropriately known as Christians of St. John, are still scattered in small numbers over the region lying about the Lower Euphrates and Tigris and other places.

3. One of a sect that arose in the ninth century, called also Pseudo-Sabians or Syrian Sabians. Their religion is described as the heathenism of the ancient Syrians, modified by Hellenic influences. Written also Sabeen, Sabeen.

Sabianism (sā'bi-an-izm), n. The doctrines or systems of the various sects known as Sabians. See SABIAN. Written also Sabeenism, Sabeianism.

Sabicu (sab-i-kō'), n. [Native name.] The name of a tree belonging to the genus Lysiloma, the L. Sabicu, growing in Cuba. The wood is very hard and tough, and used for ship-building and other purposes. Called also Sabicu-wood, Savicu, and Savicu-wood.

Sabine (sā'bin), n. [Fr. sabine, savinier, from L. sabina (herba), the Sabine herb, savin.] A plant, Juniperus Sabina. Usually written Savin (which see).

Sabine (sā'bin), n. and a. One of, or pertaining to, an ancient people from whom the founders of Rome took their daughters by force, having invited them to some public sports or shows with this object. When the Sabines came to revenge this act of violence the women acted as mediators between their fathers and husbands, and succeeded in establishing lasting peace between them. The deed is known as the 'rape of the Sabine women.'

Sable (sā'bl), n. [O. Fr. sable, from Pol. saból, Russ. sobol, a Slavonic word, whence also Sw. Dan and D. sabel.] 1. A digitigrade carnivorous mammal, nearly allied to the common marten and pine marten, the Mustela sibirica, found chiefly in the northern Fäte, fär, fat, fall; më, met, her; pine, pin; nôte, not, move; tûbe, tub, byll; oil, pound; u, Sc. abuse; y, Sc. lay.

Sable (Mustela visonina)

regions of Asia, and hunted for its fur. Its length, exclusive of the tail, is about 18 inches. Its fur, which is extremely lustrous, and hence of the very highest value, is generally brown, grayish-yellow on the throat, and with small grayish-yellow spots scattered on the sides of the neck. It is heaviest during winter, and owing to the mode of attachment of the hairs to the skin it may be pressed or smoothed in any direction. The hunting of the sable is attended by much difficulty and danger. This animal burrows in the earth or under trees, in winter and summer subsisting on small animals, and in autumn on berries. Two other species of sable are enumerated, the Japanese sable (M. melanopus) and a North American species (M. leucopus), which are similarly sought after and destroyed for their fur.—2. The fur of the sable.—3. A black or mourning suit or garment. 'Sables worn by destiny.' Young.—4. In her. black, one of the colours or tinctures employed in blazonry. In engraving it is expressed by perpendicular crossed by horizontal lines.

Sable.

Sable (sá'bl), a. [From sable, n.] Of the colour of the sable; black; dark: used chiefly in poetry.

He whose sable arms,
Black as his purpose, did the night resemble. Shak.

Sable (sá'bl), v.t. pret. & pp. sabled; ppr. sabbling. To make sable or dark in colour; to darken; to make black, sad, or dismal. 'And sabled all in black the shady sky.' G. Fletcher.

Sable-mouse (sá'bl-mous), n. A name applied to the lemming.

Sable-stoled (sá'bl-stöld), a. Wearing a sable stole or vestment. 'The sable-stoled sorcerers bear his worshipped ark.' Milton.

Sable-vested (sá'bl-vest'ed), a. Clothed in sables; covered with darkness. 'Sable-vested Night.' Milton.

Sablère (sá-blér), n. [Fr., from sable, L. sabulum, sand.] 1. A sand-pit. [Rare.]—2. In corp. same as Raising-piece.

Sabot (sá-bó), n. [Fr. Origin unknown.] 1. A wooden shoe, made of one piece hollowed out by boring tools and scrapers, and worn by the peasantry in France, Belgium, &c.—2. A thick, circular, wooden disk to which a projectile is attached so as to maintain its proper position in the bore of a gun; also, a metallic cup or disc fixed to the bottom of an elongated projectile so as to fill the bore and take the rifling when the gun is discharged.

Sabot.

Sabotière (sá-bó-tiér), n. [Fr. sabotière, sabotière, an ice-pail, corruptions of sorbetière, from sorbet, sherbet, an ice.] A machine for making ices. It consists of two principal parts, an outer pall, and an inner vessel—the sabotière proper—of smaller size. A freezing-mixture—generally of ice and salt—is turned into the outer pall, while the creams to be iced are placed in the inner vessel, which is then rotated in the outer pall amid the freezing-mixture until the cream is sufficiently frozen.

Sabre (sá'bér), n. [Fr. sabre, from the Teutonic (D. Dan. and Sw. sabel, G. säbel). The Teutonic forms themselves, however, are also foreign, perhaps Hungarian.] A sword with a broad and heavy blade, thick at the back, and a little curved towards the point, specially adapted for cutting; a cavalry sword.

Sabre (sá'bér), v.t. pret. & pp. sabred; ppr. sabring. To strike, cut, or kill with a sabre.

Flash'd all their sabres bare,
Flash'd as they turn'd in air,
Sabring the gunners there. Tennyson.

Sabretache, Sabretasche (sá'bér-tash), n. (Sabre, and G. tasche, a pocket; sabel-tasche, sabretasche.) A leathern case or outside pocket worn by cavalry at the left side, suspended from the sword-belt.

Sabulosity (sab-ú-lós'i-ti), n. [From sabulous.] The quality of being sabulous; sandiness; grittiness.

Sabulous (sab-ú-lus), a. [L. sabulosus, from sabulum, sand.] Sandy; gritty. A term often applied to the calcareous matter deposited by urine.

Saburratio (sab-ur-rá'hon), n. [L. saburra, sand.] The application of hot sand inclosed in a bag or bladder to any part of the body; sand-bathing.

Sac (sak), n. [A. Sax. sacu. See SAKE.] In law, the privilege enjoyed by the lord of a manor of holding courts, trying causes, and imposing fines.

Sac (sak), n. [L. sacculus, a bag. See SACK.] A bag or cyst; a pouch; a receptacle for a liquid; as, the lacrymal sac.—Sac of the embryo, in bot. the vesicle of the nucleus of an ovule, within which the embryo is formed.

Sacbut (sak'bút), n. See SACKBUT.

SacCADE (sak-kád'), n. [Fr., from an old verb sacquer, sacher, to pull. Origin uncertain.] In the manège, a sudden violent check of a horse by drawing or twitching the reins on a sudden and with one pull.

Saccate (sak'át), a. [L. saccus, a bag.] In bot. furnished with or having the form of a bag or pouch; as, a saccate petal.

Saccharate (sak'ka-rát), n. In chem. a salt of saccharic acid.

Saccharic (sak'kar'ik), a. [L. saccharum, sugar.] Pertaining to or obtained from sugar or allied substances; specially applied to an encrystallizable acid product (C₆H₁₀O₆) formed along with oxalic acid during the action of nitric acid on sugar.

Sacchariferous (sak'ka-rí-fér-us), a. [L. saccharum, sugar, and fero, to produce.] Producing sugar; as, sacchariferous canes.

Saccharify (sak'kar-i-fí), v.t. pret. & pp. saccharified; ppr. saccharifying. [Fr. saccharifier, from L. saccharum, sugar, and facio, to make.] To convert into sugar.

Saccharilla (sak'ka-ril'ia), n. A kind of muslin. Sinmonds.

Saccharimeter (sak'ka-rim'et-ér), n. Same as Saccharometer.

Saccharimetry (sak'ka-rim'et-ri), n. The operation or art of ascertaining the amount or proportion of sugar in solution in any liquid. Written also Saccharometry.

Saccharine (sak'ka-rín), a. [L. saccharum, sugar, from Gr. sachkar, sachkaron, sugar, a word of oriental origin. See SUGAR.] Pertaining to sugar; having the qualities of sugar; as, a saccharine taste; the saccharine matter of the cane juice.—Saccharine fermentation, the fermentation by which starch is converted into sugar, as in the process of malting.

Saccharite (sak'ka-rít), n. [L. saccharum, sugar.] A finely-grained variety of felspar, of a vitreous lustre, and white or greenish-white colour.

Saccharize (sak'kar-iz), v.t. pret. & pp. saccharized; ppr. saccharizing. To form or convert into sugar.

Saccharoid, Saccharoidal (sak'kar-oid, sak'kar-oid-al), a. [L. saccharum, sugar, and Gr. eidos, form.] Having a texture resembling that of loaf-sugar; as, saccharoid carbonate of lime, &c.

Saccharometer (sak'ka-rom'et-ér), n. [L. saccharum, sugar, and Gr. metron, a measure.] An instrument for determining the quantity of saccharine matter in any solution. One form is simply a hydrometer for taking the specific gravity of the solution; another is a kind of polariscope, so arranged that the solution may be interposed between the polarizer and analyser, and by observing the angle through which the plane of polarization is turned in passing through the solution the datum is given for the calculation of the strength.

Saccharometry (sak'ka-rom'et-ri), n. Same as Saccharimetry.

Saccharum (sak'ka-rum), n. [L., sugar. See SACCHARINE.] A genus of grasses, of the tribe Andropogoneæ. The species are widely distributed through the tropical parts of the world, and are distinguished by their highly ornamental nature and by the light and feathery or rather silk-like inflorescence. S. officinarum, or sugar-cane, the best known species, is a native of India, is cultivated in all parts of that country, and several varieties are known. It was introduced into the south of Europe, and found its way in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries into all the European colonies within the tropics. It is a perennial, with a creeping root, sending up a number of culms or stems which have many joints, and are of various colours. See SUGAR.

Sacciferous (sak-sí-fér-us), a. [L. saccus, a sac, and fero, to bear.] In bot. bearing a sac.

Sacciiform (sak'si-form), a. [L. saccus, a sac and forma, form.] Having the general form of a sac.

Saccolabium (sak-ó-lá'bl-um), n. [L. saccus, a bag, and labium, a lip, in allusion to the bagged labellum of the species.] An Asiatic genus of plants, nat. order Orchidaceæ, now extensively cultivated in hot-houses. It consists of caulescent epiphytes, with two-rowed coriaceous leaves and long crowded axillary spikes of small usually white purple-spotted flowers.

Sacomys (sak-kó-mí'dé), n. pl. A family of mammals comprising the pouched rats and gophers of North America, which are furnished with large external cheek-pouches.

Sacomys (sak'kó-mis), n. [Gr. sakkos, a pouch, and mys, a mouse.] The pouched rat. A genus of rodent mammals of the family Sacomys. The only species known is a native of North America. So named from its large cheek-pouches.

Sacopharynx (sak'kó-far-ingks), n. [Gr. sakkos, a sack, a pouch, and pharynx, the pharynx.] A genus of eels (Muræulidæ). See BOTTLE-FISH.

Saccosoma (sak-kó-só'ma), n. [Gr. sakkos, a sack, and sóma, a body.] A fossil genus of Echinodermata belonging to the order Crinoidæ. These forms appear to have been free and unattached crinoids allied to the living Comatulæ. They occur exclusively in oolitic rocks.

Saccular (sak'kú-lér), a. Like a sac; sacciiform.

Sacculated (sak'kú-lát-ed), a. Furnished with little sacs.

Saccule (sak'ól), n. [L. sacculus, dim. of saccus, a bag.] A little sac or sack; a cyst; a cell.

Sacculina (sak-ú-l'ina), n. A genus of lower crustaceans possessing a body shaped like a sausage, and found attached as a parasite to the bodies of crabs. The young is a free-swimming creature known as a Nauplius-form (which see).

Sacellum (sa-sel'lum), n. [L., dim. from sacrum, a sacred place.] 1. In anc. Rom. arch. a small inclosed space without a roof, consecrated to some deity, containing an altar, and sometimes also a statue of the god to whom it was dedicated.—2. In medæval arch. the term signifies a monumental chapel within a church; also, a small chapel in a village.

Sacerdotal (sas-ér-dó'tal), a. [L. sacerdotalis, from sacerdos, a priest. See SACRED.] Pertaining to priests or the priesthood; priestly; as, sacerdotal dignity; sacerdotal functions or garments; sacerdotal character. 'The ascendancy of the sacerdotal order.' Macaulay.

Sacerdotalism (sas-ér-dó'tal-izm), n. Sacerdotal system or spirit; the character or spirit of the priesthood; a tendency to attribute a lofty and sacred character to the priesthood; priestcraft.

As there were three degrees of attainment, light, purity, knowledge (or the divine vision), so there were three orders of the earthly hierarchy, bishops, priests, and deacons; three sacraments, baptism, the eucharist, the holy chrism; three classes, the baptized, the communicants, the monks. How sublime, how exalting, how welcome to the sacerdotalism of the West this lofty doctrine! Milman.

Sacrament (sák'rā-mēt), n. [L. sacramentum, a military oath of allegiance, an oath, from sacer, sacred.] 1. The military oath taken by every Roman soldier, by which he swore to obey his commander, and not desert his standard, hence an oath or a ceremony producing an obligation. 'Here I begin the sacrament to all.' B. Jonson. 2. In theol. an outward and visible sign of inward and spiritual grace, or more particularly, a solemn religious ceremony enjoined by Christ, the head of the Christian church, to be observed by his followers, by which their special relation to him is created or their obligations to him renewed and ratified. In the R. Cath. Ch. and the Greek Ch. it is held that there are seven sacraments, viz. baptism, confirmation, the eucharist, penance, extreme unction, holy orders, and matrimony. Protestants in general acknowledge but two sacraments, baptism and the Lord's supper. The former is called a sacrament, for by it persons are separated from the world, brought into Christ's visible church, and laid under particular obligations to obey his precepts. The latter is also a sacrament, for by commemorating the death and dying love of Christ, Christians avow their special relation to him, and renew their obligations to be faithful to their divine Master. When we use sacrament without any qualifying word we mean by it the eucharist or Lord's supper.

3. A sacred token or pledge, the pledge of a covenant.

God sometimes sent a light of fire and pillar of a cloud, and the sacrament of a rainbow, to guide his people through their portion of sorrows. Jos. Taylor.

Sacrament (sák'rā-mēt), v. t. To bind by an oath. When desperate men have sacramented themselves. Alp. Land.

Sacramental (sák'rā-mēt'al), s. 1. Constituting a sacrament or pertaining to it; having the character of a sacrament, as, sacramental rites or elements. 2. Bound by a sacrament or oath.

Saddle-roof (sad'l-röf), n. A roof having two gables. Sometimes termed Packsaddle Roof and Saddle-back Roof.

Saddle-rug (sad'l-rug), n. A cloth under a saddle.

Saddlery (sad'lär-i), n. 1. The manufactures of a saddler; the articles usually on sale in a saddler's shop.—2. Trade or employment of a saddler.

Saddle-shaped (sad'l-shäpt), a. Having the shape of a saddle. In geol. applied to strata bent on each side of a mountain without being broken at the top.

Saddle-tree (sad'l-tré), n. The frame of a saddle.

Sadducee (sad-dü-kä'ik), a. Pertaining to or characteristic of the Sadducees; as, Sadducee reasoning.

Sadducean (sad-dü-sä'an), a. Pertaining to the Sadducees.

Sadducees (sad'dü-sä), n. [Gr. saddoukaioi, Heb. sadukim, probably from Zadok, a distinguished priest in the time of David.] One of a sect or party among the ancient Jews. They denied the existence of any spiritual beings except God, and believed that the soul died with the body, and therefore that there was no resurrection. They also rejected the authority of the oral law which was upheld by the Pharisees, and adhered to the text of the Mosaic law.

Sadduceism, Sadducism (sad'dü-sä-izm, sad'dü-sä-izm), n. The tenets of the Sadducees.

Sadducize (sad'dü-sä), v.t. pret. & pp. sadducized; ppr. sadducizing. To conform to the doctrines of the Sadducees; to adopt the principles of the Sadducees. 'Sadducizing Christians.' Atterbury.

Sad-eyed (sad'id), a. Having a sad countenance. Shak.

Sad-faced (sad'fäst), a. Having a sad or sorrowful face. Shak.

Sad-hearted (sad'härt-ed), a. Sorrowful; melancholy. Shak.

Sad-iron (sad'ir-ern), n. An instrument for ironing or smoothing clothes; a flat-iron.

Sadly (sad'li), adv. 1. In a sad manner: (a) sorrowfully; mournfully; miserably; grievously.

He sadly suffers in their grief. Dryden.

(b) In a manner to cause sadness; badly; afflictively; calamitously; as, it turned out sadly. (c) In a dark colour; darkly.

A gloomy obscure place, and in it only one light, which the genius of the house held, sadly attired. B. Jonson.

2. † Seriously; soberly; gravely.

To tell thee sadly, shepherd, without blame Or our neglect, we lost her as we came. Milton.

3. † Steadily.

This messenger drank sadly ale and wine, And stolen were his letters privily. Chaucer.

Sadness (sad'nes), n. 1. The state or quality of being sad; sorrowfulness; mournfulness; dejection of mind; as, grief and sadness at the memory of sin.

If the subject be mournful, let everything in it have a stroke of sadness. Dryden.

2. A melancholy look; gloom of countenance.

Dim sadness did not spare

Celestial visages. Milton.

Tell me, in sadness, who she is you love. Shak.

4. † Steadiness. Chaucer.

Sadr (sad'r), n. The name given by the Arabs of Barbary to the lote-bush (Zizyphus Lotus), whose berries they use as food.

Safe (säf), a. [O.E. saf, from Fr. sauv, safe, from L. salvus, safe; akin to Gr. holos, Skr. sarva, whole, entire.] 1. Free from or not liable to danger of any kind; as, safe from enemies; safe from disease; safe from storms; safe from the malice of foes.—2. Free from or having escaped hurt, injury, or damage; as, to walk safe over red-hot ploughshares; to bring goods safe to land.—3. Not accompanied with or likely to cause injury or danger; not exposing to danger; securing from harm; as, a safe guide; a safe harbour; a safe bridge; it is not safe to go there. 'In what safe place you have bestowed my money.' Shak.

'Tis politic and safe to let him keep

At point a hundred knights. Shak.

4. No longer dangerous; placed beyond the power of doing harm.

Banquo's safe.

—Aye, my good lord, safe in a ditch. Shak.

5. Sound; whole; good. 'A trade that I may use with a safe conscience.' Shak.—Safe, Secure. In our present English the difference between these two words is hardly recognized, but a clear distinction was often made by some of our earlier writers: safe, implying free from danger or evil results; secure, free of care, careless, easy in mind.

We cannot endure to be disturbed or awakened from our pleasing lethargy. For we care not to be safe, but to be secure; not to escape hell, but to live pleasantly. Jer. Taylor.

Safe (säf), n. 1. A place of safety; specifically, (a) a strong case for containing money, jewels, account-books, and other valuable articles, to guard them from the attacks of burglars or against the action of fire. (b) A ventilated or refrigerated receptacle, in which meat is kept cool and fresh, and free from the attacks of noxious insects.—2. † A pantry.

Safe (säf), v.t. To render safe.

And that which most with you should safe my going is Fulvia's death. Shak.

Safe-conduct (säf'kon-dukt), n. That which gives a safe passage; as, (a) a convoy or guard to protect a person in an enemy's country or in a foreign country; (b) a writing, a pass or warrant of security given to a person by the sovereign of a country to enable him to travel with safety.

Safe-conduct (säf'kon-dukt'), v.t. To conduct or convoy safely; to give a safe passage to, especially through a hostile country. 'Safe-conducting the rebels for the ships. Shak.

Safeguard (säf'gärd), n. 1. One who or that which defends or protects; defence; protection.

The smallest worm will turn, being trodden on, And doves will peck in safe-guard of their brood. Shak.

The sword, the safeguard of thy brother's throne, Is now become the bulwark of thine own. Granville.

2. A convoy or guard to protect a traveller.

3. A passport; a warrant of security given by a sovereign to protect a stranger within his territories; formerly a protection granted to a stranger in prosecuting his rights in due course of law.

A trumpet was sent to the Earl of Essex for a safe-guard or pass to two lords, to deliver a message from the king to the two houses. Clarendon.

4. An outer petticoat to save women's clothes on horseback. Beau. & FL.

Safeguard (säf'gärd), v.t. To guard; to protect.

To safeguard thine own life.

The best way is to vengeance my Gloster's death. Shak.

Safe-keeping (säf'kep-ing), n. The act of keeping or preserving in safety from injury or from escape; secure guardianship; as, I shall leave it in your safe-keeping.

Safely (säf'li), adv. In a safe manner: (a) without incurring danger or hazard of evil consequences.

All keep aloof, and safely shout around. Dryden

(b) Without hurt or injury; in safety. 'That my ships are safely come to road.' Shak.

The remnant of his days he safely past. Prior.

(c) In close custody; securely; carefully.

Till then I'll keep him dark and safely locked. Shak.

Safeness (säf'nes), n. The condition or quality of being safe; the state of being safe or of conferring safety; freedom from danger; as, the safeness of an experiment; the safeness of a bridge or of a boat.

Safe-pledge (säf'plej), n. In law, a surety appointed for one's appearance at a day assigned.

Safety (säf'ti), n. 1. The state or quality of being safe or uninjured; exemption from hurt, injury, or loss; as, to escape dangers in safety. 'Hath passed in safety through the narrow seas.' Shak.—2. The state of not being liable to danger or injury; a state or condition out of harm's way; freedom from danger; preservation; as, here you are in perfect safety; you may do it with all safety; to run to a cave for safety; to provide for one's own safety.

Would I were in an ale-house in London! I would give all my fame for a pot of ale and safety. Shak.

Sometimes used in plural.

Let not my jealousies be your dishonour.

But mine own safeties. Shak.

3. The state or quality of not causing danger; safeness; the quality of making safe or secure, or of inspiring confidence, justifying trust, ensuring against harm, loss, or the like; as, the safety of an electric experiment.

Would there were any safety in thy sex, That I might put a thousand sorrows off, And credit thy repentance. Beau. & FL.

4. Preservation from escape; close custody.

Imprison him;

Deliver him to safety and return. Shak.

Safety-arch (säf'ti-ärch), n. Same as Dis-charging-arch.

Safety-beam (säf'ti-bém), n. In rail, a beam of a truck frame furnished with straps passing around to prevent dangerous contingencies, by retaining the parts in their proper relative positions in case of the axle breaking.

Safety-belt (säf'ti-belt), n. A belt made of some buoyant material or inflated to sustain a person in water; a life-belt; a safety-buoy.

Safety-buoy (säf'ti-boi), n. A safety-belt.

Safety-cage (säf'ti-käj), n. A cage for raising and lowering miners. It travels upon guides of wood or iron fixed against the sides of the shaft, and is fitted with levers and catches, so that in the event of a rope breaking the levers or catches fly out, and either press against the guides or clip them, by which the cage is prevented from falling.

Safety-fuse (säf'ti-füz), n. A fuse used in blasting operations, consisting generally of a hollow cord of spun yarn, tarred on the outside to render it water-proof, and filled with tightly rammed gunpowder. Such fuses are made to burn at a certain rate (say 2 feet) per minute, so that the time elapsing between the igniting of the fuse and the desired explosion can be easily determined.

A gutta-percha fuse-tube is sometimes used in cases of blasting under water.

Safety-lamp (säf'ti-lamp), n. A lamp for lighting coal-mines without exposing workmen to the explosion of fire-damp. It consists of a cistern for holding the oil, in the top of which the wick is placed. Over the cistern is placed a cylinder of wire-gauze, so as to envelope the flame. By this contrivance light is transmitted to the miner without endangering the kindling of the atmosphere of fire-damp which may surround him; because the heat of the flame is decreased so much in passing through the wire gauze that it is incapable of igniting the inflammable gas (carburetted hydrogen) outside. In some forms of the lamp a glass cylinder is placed inside the gauze cage; this restricts air currents and ensures a steadier light.

Safety-lintel (sæf-ti-lin-tel), n. A name given to the wooden lintel which is placed behind a stone lintel in the aperture of a door or window.

Safety-pin (sæf-ti-pin), n. A pin having its point fitted into a kind of sheath, so that it may not be readily withdrawn or prick the wearer or others while in use.

Safety-plug (sæf-ti-plug), n. In steam-boilers, a bolt having its centre filled with a fusible metal screwed into the top of the fire-box, so that when the water becomes too low the increased temperature melts out the metal, and thus admits the water to put the fire out, and save the tubes and fire-box from injury by too great heat.

Safety-tube (sæf-ti-tub), n. An arrangement adapted to a gas-generating vessel, to prevent the liquid into which the delivery tube dips from passing back into the vessel in consequence of diminished internal pressure. The simplest form consists of a straight tube passing through the cork of the generating vessel and dipping below the surface of the liquid, or of a tube bent twice at right angles, passing just through the cork, so that a portion of liquid may remain in the lower bend and form a liquid joint, cutting off the communication between the inside of the vessel and the external air.

Safety-valve (sæf-ti-valv), n. A contrivance for obviating or diminishing the risk of explosions in steam-boilers. The form and construction of safety-valves are exceedingly various, but the principle of all is the same: that of opposing the pressure within the boiler by such a force as will yield before it reaches the point of danger, and permit the steam to escape. The most simple and obvious kind of safety-valve is that in which a weight is placed directly over a steam-tight plate, fitted to an aperture in the boiler. When, however, the pressure is high, this form becomes inconvenient, and the lever safety-valve is adopted. This form is represented in fig. 1, where s is the valve, fitted to move vertically, and guided by a stem passing through the seat, b, the boiler, c, the valve-seat, usually, as well as the valve itself, formed of gun-metal (the same letters indicate the corresponding parts in fig. 2); d, the lever working upon a fixed centre at e, and pressing upon the valve by a steel point, f, is a guide for the lever, and g a weight which may be adjusted to any distance from the centre, according to the pressure required. In locomotive engines, where the lever and weight would occupy too much space, it is usual to adopt the spring safety-valve, one form of which is shown at fig. 2. A series of bent springs, A A A, are placed alternately Safflower (sæf-flor), n. Same as Safflower.

Lever Safety-valve.

An herb they call safflower, or burnard saffron, dyers use for scarlet.

Safflower (sæf-flor), n. (From saffron and flower, comp. G. safflor.) Bastard saffron, a composite plant of the genus Carthamus, the C. tinctorius. It is cultivated in China, India, Egypt, and also in the south of Europe, on account of its flowers, which in their dried state form the safflower of commerce. An oil is expressed from the seeds, which is used by the Asiatics as a laxative medicine. It is also most extensively used as a lamp-oil. The dried flowers afford two colouring matters (also called safflower), a yellow and a red, the latter (carthamine) being that for which they are most valued. They are chiefly used for dyeing silk, affording various shades of pink, rose, crimson, and scarlet. Mixed with finely-powdered tale, safflower forms a common variety of rouge. It is also used for adulterating saffron, a much more expensive dye-stuff.

Saffron (sæf-ran), n. (Fr. saffron, from Sp. safrán, from Ar and Far safrán, saffron; with the article, as safrán.) The plant was cultivated by the Moors in Spain. A plant of the genus Crocus, the C. sativus. It is a low ornamental plant, with grass-like leaves and large crocus-like flowers of a purple colour. It is a native of Greece and Asia Minor, but extensively cultivated in Austria, France, Spain, and also formerly in England. The dried stigmas form the saffron of the shops, which, when good, has a sweetish, penetrating, diffusive odour; a warm, pungent, bitterish taste, and a rich deep orange colour. Saffron is employed, especially on the Continent, as a colouring and flavouring ingredient in culinary preparations, liqueurs, &c.; in medicine it is now only applied for similar purposes, but formerly it was considered to possess stimulant, emmenagogue, cordial, and antispasmodic properties. It gives to water and alcohol about three-fourths of its weight of an orange-red extract, which is largely employed in painting and dyeing. It is often adulterated with the petals of other plants, especially with those of the safflower and marigold. The name bastard saffron is given to safflower, meadow-saffron is Colchicum autumnale; hay-saffron consists of the stigmas of the Crocus sativus, with part of the style, carefully dried, and cake-saffron, of cakes made of safflower and gum-water.

Saffron (sæf-ran), a. Having the colour of saffron flowers; yellow. 'Saffron flame.' Chapman.

Did this complexion with the saffron face Reveal and fawn it at my house to-day.

Aurea now had left her saffron bed. Dryden.

Saffron (sæf-ran), v.t. To tinge with saffron, to make yellow, to gild.

Saffron (sæf-ran), a. Having the colour of saffron.

The woman was of complexion yellowish or saffron, as we then said the man had too freely got his beams.

Sag (sag), v.t. prok sagged; ppr sagging [S. sag, to sink, to subside, perhaps from A. Sag, signa, to sink, allied to L. G. signum, D. signum, to sink down.] 1. To sink, incline, or hang away owing to insufficiently supported weight; to settle, to sink in the middle, as, a building sags to the north or south, the door sags; a beam sags by means of its weight.

The party returned home as it came, all tired and happy, excepting little Alfred, who was tired and cross, and sat saggy on his father's knee.

Hence — 2. To yield under the pressure of care, difficulty, trouble, doubt, or the like; to become unsettled or unbalanced; to waver or fluctuate.

The mind I sway by, and the heart I bear, Shall never sag with doubt, nor shake with fear.

Sag (sag), v.t. To cause to bend or give way, to load or burden.

Sag (sag), n. The state or act of sinking, bending, or sagging.

Saga (saga), n. (Icel. saga, a tale, a history; from saga, E. to say, See Sayer.) An ancient Scandinavian legend or tradition of considerable length, relating either mythical or historical events, a tale, a history, as, the Völsunga saga, the Knytinga saga, &c.

And thus had Harold, in his youth, Heard many a saga's rhyme unceasing — Of that sea-maiden's tremendous curl'd, Whom monstrous circle girds the world.

And then the blue-eyed Norseman said, A saga of the days of old.

In the true Saga age the Icelanders had no 'habit of writing'; they simply told their stories, which were handed down with scrupulous fidelity by word of mouth, and without the use of either pen or ink. When the art of writing came in, the true Saga period perished. Just as the printing press extinguished manuscripts, so did manuscript sagas in Iceland and the North.

Sagacious (sæ-gi-ah-us), a. [L. sagax, sagax, keen-scented, acute, sagacious, from sagis, to perceive keenly, from a root signifying to be sharp, seen in Gr. sagis, a battle-axe, and Skr. saghamati, to kill.] 1. Quick of scent; able to scent or perceive by the senses.

He scented the grim Fastræ, and upstart'd His nostrils with into the murky air;

Sagacious of his quarry from so far. Milton.

2. Intellectually keen or quick, acute in discernment or penetration, discerning and judicious; shrewd, as, a sagacious mind.

Only sagacious heads light on these observations.

Sage (sage), n. Full of or informed by wisdom; sage; wise; as, a sage remark.

In Homer we find not a few of these sagacious, part sentences, into which men unaccustomed with books are fond of compressing their experience of human life.

Sagacity (sæ-gi-ti-ti), n. (Fr. sagacité; L. sagacitas, from sagax, sagax, keen-scented, acute.) The quality of being sagacious, sagaciousness, as, (a) quickness or acuteness of discernment or penetration, readiness of apprehension with soundness of judgment; clear-headedness, shrewdness and common sense.

Sagacity finds out the intermediate ideas, to discover what connection there is in each link of the chain.

(b) Intelligence resembling that of mankind; as, the sagacity of a dog or an elephant.

Sagamore (sag-a-mor), n. 1. Among some tribes of American Indians, a king or chief.

Some writers regard sagamore as synonymous with sachem, but others distinguish between them, regarding sachem as a chief of the first rank, and sagamore as one of the second.

Sagamore, sachem, or powwow Longfellow. — 2. A juice sometimes used medicinally. Johnson.

Sagapen (sag-a-pen), n. See SAGAPENUM.

Sagapenum (sag-a-pen), n. (Or sagapenum, the Persea persea and its gum.) A fetid gum-resin brought from Persia and Alexandria, generally believed to be furnished by some species of the genus Ferula.

It occurs either in tears or irregular masses of a dirty brownish colour, containing in the interior white or yellowish grains. It has an odour of garlic, and a hot, acrid, bitterish taste. It is occasionally used in medicine as a nervine and stimulating expectorant.

Sagathy (sag-a-thi), n. (Fr. sagatie; Sp. sagath, sagathy, from L. sagum, a blanket or mentle.) A mixed woven fabric of silk and cotton, sayette. 'A panegyric on pieces of sayette.' Taitel.

Sagvut (sag'vut), n. Same as Shakut. Burton.

Sage (saj), n. [Fr. sauge, from L. salvia, sage, from salvus, safe, sound—on account of the reputed virtues of the plant.] The common name of plants of the genus Salvia, a very large genus of monocotyledonous angiospermous plants, nat. order Labiales, containing about 450 species, widely dispersed through the temperate and warmer regions of the globe. They are herbs or shrubs of widely varying habit, usually with entire or ciliate leaves and various coloured (rarely yellow) flowers. The best known and most frequently used in this country is the S. officinalis, or garden sage, a native of various parts of the south of Europe. This plant is much used in cookery, and is supposed to assist the stomach in digesting fat and succulent foods. It was formerly in great repute as a sudorific, aromatic, astringent, and antiseptic. It possesses stimulant properties in a high degree, and sage tea is commended as a stomachic and slight stimulant. Two species, S. pratensis (meadow-sage) and S. verbenacea (wild sage or vervain clary), are natives of Great Britain.—Sage apple, an excrement upon a species of sage (Salvia pomifera) caused by the puncture of an insect.—Sage brush, a low irregular shrub (Artemisia ludoviciana) of the order Compositae, growing in dry alkaline soils of the American plains. The name is also given to other American species of Artemisia.—Sage cheese, a kind of cheese, flavoured, and coloured green with the juice of sage. The juice of sage is also usually added to heighten its colour.—Sage coat, a bird belonging to the Troglodytes (Controcyttus virgatus), resembling the parrot-fowl, but much larger. It is found in the Rocky Mountain region, and feeds on the leaves of the sage brush.

Sage (saj), n. [Fr. sage, from L. sapiens (extant only in se-sapiens, imprudent), later form sabius, wise, from root of sapio, to taste (whence sapient).] 1. Wise, having nice discernment and powers of judging, prudent, sagacious, as a sage counsellor. 'Sage, grave men.' Shak.

Most men fill by losing under the sage's eye.
Will back their own opinions with a sage. Byron.

2. Proceeding from wisdom; well-judged, well adapted to the purpose, as, sage counsel. 'Under show of sage advice.' Milton.
3. Grave, solemn, serious. 'Sage and solemn times.' Milton. Six Wise sagacious, sapient, grave, prudent, judicious.

Sage (saj), n. A wise man, a man of gravity and wisdom; particularly a man venerable for years, and known as a man of sound judgment and prudence, a grave philosopher. 'Grown where immortal ages laugh.' Pope.

Unseen before in heaven, proclaims him cross,
And golden the eastern eyes. Milton.

He thought as a sage but he felt as a man. Scott.
Sagely (saj'li), adv. In a sage manner; wisely; with just discernment and prudence. 'Our saviour sagely thus replied.' Milton.

Saguna (sa'juna), n. See SAGUNE.

Saguness (saj'nes), n. The quality of being sage; wisdom, sagacity, prudence, gravity.
Sagunite (saj'en-ite), n. [Fr. sagunite, from L. saguna, or saguna, a large net.] Acicular rutile, or red oxide of titanium. The acicular crystals cross each other, giving a reticulated appearance, hence the name.

Sagunite (saj-en-ite), n. (See above.) Applied to quartz when containing acicular crystals of other materials, most commonly rutile, also tourmaline, actinolite, and the like.

Sag (sag), v. t. Same as Sag.
Sagger (sag'er), n. (See SAGGAR.) 1. A sagger or clay pot used in making pottery-wares. See SAGGAR.—2. A clay used in making these pots.

Sagina (sa'jina), n. Pearl-wort, a genus of plants. See PEARL-WORT.

Saginate (saj'i-nat), v. t. [L. sagina, sagina, to fatten, to feed.] To fatten, to glut, to fatten.

Sagitta (saj'i-ta), n. [L. an arrow] 1. The Arrow one of the old constellations of the northern hemisphere. It contains no stars higher than the fourth magnitude.—2. In med. a genus of annelids, forming Huxley's order Chætopoda. This animal is a transparent marine form, attaining the length of about an inch. The head carries a series of setae or bristles surrounding the mouth, and the hinder margin of the body is fringed. A single nerve-mass lies in the abdomen. The species are found living in the open sea, in the Mediterranean, and in the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. The affinities of this animal are with the worms, but it is anomalous in respect of its variations from the worm type.—3. The keystone of an arch. [Rare].—4. In geom. (a) the vertex of an arc. (b) The abscissa of a curve. [Rare].

Sagittal (saj'i-tal), n. [L. sagittalis, from sagitta, an arrow.] Pertaining to an arrow, resembling an arrow in anal. applied to the suture which unites the parietal bones of the skull.

His wound was between the sagittal and coronal sutures to the base. McMurray.

Sagittaria (saj-i-ta'ri-a), n. (From L. sagitta, an arrow—the leaves resembling an arrow-head.) A genus of plants, nat. order Alismaceae. The species are water-plants, and are found in the bottom and temperate parts of the globe, and are frequently remarkable for the beauty of their white three-petalled flowers. S. arifolia, or common arrow-head, is indigenous in this country. The rhizomes of many of the species contain a starchy matter, and form a nutritious food.

Sagittarius (saj-i-ta'ri-us), n. [L. an archer] One of the zodiacal constellations which the sun enters Nov. 22. It is represented on celestial globes and charts by the figure of a centaur in the act of shooting an arrow from his bow.

Sagittary (saj-i-ta-ri), n. (See above.) 1. An old name for a centaur.—2. The animal at Venice, or the residence there of the commanders of the army and navy, so called from the figure of an archer over the gate. Shak.

Sagittary (saj-i-ta-ri), n. Pertaining to an arrow. Sir T. Brown.

Sagittate (saj-i-tat), n. [L. sagitta, an arrow.] Shaped like the head of an arrow; triangular, hollowed at the base, with angles at the hinder part; sagittal; used Sagittate Leaf, especially in bot.

Sago (saj'o), n. (Malay and Javanese sago, from Papua sago, bread.) A kind of starch, produced from the stem or cellular substance of several palms and palm-like vegetables, the chief of which are the Sagum latifolius, S. Rumphii, the Phoenix formosensis, Corypha Gebanga, Corypha urens, Sagurus monstrosa, and some cycads, but these last yield a very inferior sort. Sagum latifolius, from which the finest sago is prepared, forms immense forests on nearly all the Moluccas, each tree yielding from 100 to 200 lbs. of sago. The tree when at maturity is about 30 feet high, and from 15 to 25 inches in diameter. The sago or medullary matter, which is prepared by the plant for the use of the flowers and ing, and the meal laid to dry. For exportation, the finest sago meal is mixed with water, and then rubbed into small grains of the size and form of coriander seeds. This is the kind principally brought to England. The Malays have a process for refining sago, and giving it a fine pearly taste, the method of which is not known to Europeans, but there are strong reasons to believe that a heat is employed, because the starch is partially transformed into gum. The sago so cured is in the highest estimation in all the European markets. Sago forms a light, wholesome, nutritious food, and may be used as a padding, or prepared in other ways as an article of diet for children and invalids when a farinaceous diet is required.—Partridge sago. See under ASUVE.

Sagouin, Sagouin (sa'goin, sag'o-in), n. (The native South American name.) A genus (Callitrich) of Brazilian platyrrhine monkeys of small size, and remarkably light active, and graceful in their movements. Both the body and tail are covered with beautiful fur, and the latter they use as a protection against cold. When tame they are very gentle and much attached to their masters. Their tail is non prehensile. Called also Squirrel Monkey and Samarita.

Saguaran (saj'o-ruan), n. A genus of plants, nat. order Palmaceae or palms, inhabiting the Indian Archipelago and some parts of the Asiatic continent. S. secharifera (the sarga or gomuti palm) is of great value to the natives of the Indian islands, yielding a valuable fibre, palm-wine, and sugar, and considerable quantities of sago, of a rather inferior quality. See GOMUTI.

Sagum (saj'gum), n. [L.] The military cloak worn by the Roman soldiers and inferior officers, in contradistinction to the paludamentum of the superior officers. It was the garb of war, as the toga was the garb of peace.

Sagus (saj'gus), n. A genus of palms from which sago is obtained. See SAGO.

Sagy (saj'i), n. Full of sago, seasoned with sago.

Sahib (sah'ib), n. (Hind., from Ar. sahib, lord, master.) A term used by the natives of India or Persia in addressing or speaking of Europeans, as the sahib did no and so; Colonel sahib Sahib is the corresponding feminine form.

Sahlite (sah'li-te), n. Same as Malakite.

Sail (saj'l), n. A species of sapejo or South American platyrrhine monkey, the Cebus cynomolgus, found in Brazil. Called also the Weeper Monkey. See SAPAJOU.

Salic (saj'ik), n. [Fr. saule, from Turk. salih, a male.] A Turkish or Grecian vessel, very common in the Levant, a kind of ketch which has no top-gallant-mast nor mizen-top-mast.

Said (sajd), pret. & pp. of say, as written for seid. 1. Declared, uttered, reported.—2. Aforementioned, before mentioned; used chiefly in legal style. 'King John succeeded his said brother.' Sir M. Hale.

Saiga (saj'a), n. A species of antelope (Capra or Antelope Saiga) found on the steppes of Russia and on the Russian borders of Asia. It forms one of the two European species of antelopes; the other being the chamois. The nose is of peculiar structure, the openings being very large and covered by a soft cartilaginous arch. The saiga of Turkey (S. Tartaria) is presumably a distinct species from the above.

Sail (saj), n. [A. Sax. segel, sepl, a sail, on ice; sepl, G. and Sw. segel, Dan. seil, D. segel; the term no doubt denotes an agent, and the word is probably from an Indo-European root (segh) meaning to check, to resist.] 1. A piece of cloth or a texture or tissue of some kind spread to the wind to cause, or assist in causing, a vessel to move through the water. The sails of European vessels are usually made of several breadths of canvas, sewed together with a double seam at the borders, and edged all round with a cord or cord called the bolt-rope or bolt-ropes. A sail extended by a yard hung (slung) by the middle and halsed in is called a square sail; a sail set upon a gaff boom, or stay is called a fore-and-aft sail. The upper part of every sail is the head, the lower part the foot, the sides in general are called leeches, but the weather side or edge (that is, the side next the mast or stay to which it is attached) of any but a square sail is called the ho, and the other edge the after leech. The lower two corners of a square sail are in general clues, the weather cline of a fore-andast sail, or of a course while set, is the teak. Sails generally take their names, partly at least, from the mast, yard, or stay upon which they are stretched; thus, the main-course, main-top sail, main-topgallant sail are respectively the sails on the mainmast, main-topmast, and main-topgallant mast. The principal sails in a full-rigged vessel are the courses or lower sails, the topsails and topgallant sails. The cut shows the sails of a ship, which are not greatly different from those of a barque. The vessel represented might, however, carry additional sails to those shown; thus she might have staymasts on the stays of the main and mizzen masts, and fore-and-aft sails (called spencers) on the main and fore masts. — 2 A funnel-shaped bag, open at both ends, on the deck of a ship to intercept or gather air and lead it below deck for the purpose of ventilation. — 3 That portion of the arm of a windmill which catches the wind. 'And the whirling sail goes round.' Tennyson. — 4 A wing. [Postal.]

He, cutting way
With his broad sail, about him soared round;
At last, low stooping with unwieldy way,
Snatch'd up both horse and man. Spenser.

5 A ship or other vessel; as, we saw a sail and gave chase; used as a plural with the singular form; as, the fleet consisted of 30 sails. Sometimes collectively, a fleet.

We have despatched upon our neighbouring shores,
A portly sail of ships make hitherward. Shak.

6 A journey or excursion upon water; a passage in a vessel or boat.

Here is my journey's end, here is my butt,
And very set-mark of my utmost sail. Shak.
— Full sail, with all sails set. — To loose sails, to unfurl them. — To make sail, to extend an additional quantity of sail. — To set sail, to expand or spread the sails; and hence, to begin a voyage. — To shorten sail, to reduce the extent of sail or take in a part. — To strike sail, (a) to lower the sails suddenly, as in saluting or in sudden gusts of wind. Acts xxvii. 17. (b) To abate show or pomp. [Colloq.]

Margaret
Must strike her sail and learn awhile to serve Where kings command. Shak.

— Under sail, having the sails spread.
Sail (sail), v. t. [From the noun.] 1. To be impelled or driven forward by the action of wind upon sails, as a ship on water; hence, to move or be impelled, as a ship or boat, by any mechanical power, as by steam, oars, &c.; as, a ship sails ten knots an hour; she sails well close-hauled. — 2. To be conveyed in a vessel on water; to pass by water; as, we sailed from London to Canton.

And when we had sailed over the sea of Cilicia and Pamphylia, we came to Myra, a city of Lycia. Acts xxvii. 5.

3. To swim, as a fish or swimming bird.
Little dolphins, when they sail
In the vast shadow of the British whale. Dryden.

4. To set sail; to begin a voyage.
There yet were many weeks before she sailed,
Sail'd from this port. Tennyson.

5. To fly without striking with the wings; to glide through the air without apparent exertion; to move smoothly through the air. 'Sails upon the bosom of the air.' Shak. 'Sails between worlds and worlds with steady wing.' Milton.

The owl Aethion
Sailing on obscene wings athwart the noon,
Drops his blue-fringed lids. Coleridge.

6. To pass smoothly along; to glide; to float; as, the clouds sail; she sailed into the room.

— To sail over, in arch. to project beyond a surface. Swift.

Sail (sail), v. t. 1. To pass or move upon or over by means of sails or other propulsive means, as steam, oars, &c.

A thousand ships were mann'd to sail the sea. Dryden.

2. To move upon or pass over, as in a ship. 'Sail seas in cockles.' Shak. — 3. To fly through.

Sublime she sails
Th' aerial space, and mounts the winged gales. Pope.

4. To navigate; to direct or manage the motion of, as, to sail one's own ship.

Sailable (sail'able), a. Capable of being sailed on or through navigable; admitting of being passed by ships.

Sail-boat (sail'boat), n. A boat propelled by or fitted for a sail or sails.

Sailborne (sail'born), a. Borne or conveyed by sails. Falconer.

Sail-broad (sail'brod), a. Spreading like a sail.

At last his sail-broad vans
He spreads for flight. Milton.

Sailcloth (sail'cloth), n. Canvas or duck used in making sails for ships, &c.

Sails, v. t. To assail. Romans of the Road.

Sailer (sail'er), n. 1 One that sails; a seaman; a sailor. Sir P. Sidney. [Rare.] — 2 A ship or other vessel with reference to her manner of sailing; as, a heavy sailer; a fast sailer; a prime sailer.

'You must be mad. She is the fastest sailer between here and the Thames.' 'I care not!' the porter replied, matching up a stout oaken staff that lay in a corner, 'I'm an old sailer.' G. A. Sala.

Sail-fish (sail'fish), n. A name given to the basking shark (Setache maximus), from its habit of swimming on the surface of the water with its dorsal fin exposed, somewhat like the sail of a ship. Farrell.

Sail-hook (sail'hok), n. A small hook used for holding the seams of a sail square in the act of sewing.

Sail-hoop (sail'hop), n. One of the rings by which fore-and-aft sails are secured to masts and stays.

Sailing (sail'ing), n. 1. The act of one who or that which sails. — 2. The art or rules of navigation; the art or the act of directing a ship on a given line laid down in a chart. The term is also applied to the rules by which in particular circumstances a ship's place and its motion are computed. — Current sailing, the method of determining the true course and distance of a ship when her own motion is combined with that of a current.

— Globular sailing. See GLOBULAR. — Great circle sailing, the manner of conducting a ship between one place and another, so that her track may be along or nearly along the arc of a great circle, that is a circle whose plane would pass through the two places and the centre of the earth, the arc of a great circle being the curve of shortest distance between any two places. — Mercator's sailing, that in which problems are solved according to the principles applied in Mercator's projection. See MERCATOR'S CHART. — Middle-latitude sailing. See under MIDDLE. — Oblique sailing. See OBLIQUE. — Parallel sailing. See PARALLEL. — Transverse sailing. See TRAVERSE.

Sailing-master (sail'ing-mas'ter), n. See MASTER, 1 (c).

Sailless (sail'less), a. Destitute of sails.

Sail-loft (sail'loft), n. A loft or apartment where sails are cut out and made.

Salam (sa-lam'), n. Same as SALAM.

Salamander (sa-lam-an'-der), n. [Fr. salamandre, L. and Gr. salamandra, lit. salamandrina, salamander.] The popular name of a genus (Salamandra) of amphibian reptiles, order Urodela, very closely allied to the newts, differing from them chiefly in having a cylindrical instead of a compressed tail, and by bringing forth their young alive. The salamanders have an elongated lizard-like form (but differ from lizards in having gills in their early stages), four feet, and a long tail. The head is thick, the tongue broad, and the palatal teeth in two long series. The skin is warty with many glands secreting a watery fluid, which the animal exudes when alarmed. As this fluid is injur-ous to small animals the salamanders have the reputation of extreme venomousness, though they are in reality entirely harmless. The best known species is the S. vulgaris, the common salamander of the north of Europe.

Common Salamander (Salamandra atra).

It is about 6 to 8 inches long, is found in moist places under stones or the roots of trees, near the borders of springs, in deep woods, &c. and passes its life in concealment except at night or during rain. It is sometimes called the Spotted Salamander (S. maculosa), from the bright yellow stripes on its sides. There are various other species in Europe, Asia, and America. In America the name is often given to the menopoma (Menopoma allopomus). Salamanders feed on worms, slugs, snails and insects. According to a superstition once very prevalent, salamanders sought the hottest fire to breed in, quenching it with the extreme frigidity of their body. Flay tells us he tried the experiment, and the creature was burned to powder. It is probable that the absurd belief is due to the moisture above referred to as exuding from the skin. The salamander of the middle ages was a being in human shape which lived always in fire, a kind of fire-spirit. By some the newts are regarded as salamanders, under the name of Water or Aquatic Salamanders.—2. A poached rat (Geomys puerilis) found in Georgia and Florida. 3. A large iron poker, also, an iron plate used for cooking purposes. (Provincial).—4. A piece of metal fixed in a suitable handle, and heated, formerly used on board ships for the purpose of firing guns.—Salamander's wood or salamander's hair, a name sometimes given to fibrous asbestos from its incombustibility.

Salamite (sa-lam'-it), n. A kind of fishing net, two corners of which are attached to the upper extremities of two long bamboos tied crosswise, their lower extremities being fastened to a bar on the raft, which acts as a hinge, a movable pole, arranged with a counterpoise as a sort of crane, supports the bamboos at the point of junction, and thus enables the fishermen to raise or depress the net at pleasure. The lower extremities of the net are guided by a cone, which, being drawn towards the raft at the same time that the long bamboos are elevated by the crane and counterpoise, only a small portion of the net remains in the water, and is easily cleared of its contents by means of a landing net.

Salamstone (sa-lam-ston), n. A variety of sapphires, which consists of small transparent crystals, generally six-sided prisms of pale reddish and bluish colours. It is brought from Ceylon.

Salary (sal'-e-ri), n. [L. salarius, from sal, salt, originally salt-money, money given to buy salt; as part of the pay of Roman soldiers; hence, stipend, pay.] The recompense or consideration stipulated to be paid to a person periodically for services, usually a fixed sum to be paid by the year, half-year, or quarter. When paid at shorter periods the recompense is usually called pay or wages; thus, a judge, governor, or teacher receives a salary, a labourer receives wages.

O, this is here and salary, not revenge. Shakspeare.

Salary (sal'-e-ri), v. t. pret. & pp. salari'd; pp. salari'ing. To pay a salary or stipend to, to attach salary to, as, a salari'd post.

As long as public teachers are salari'd and recompensed by the people there is very little danger of their becoming tyrants by force. Merivale.

Salary (sal'-e-ri), a. Saline. See T. Brown.

Sale (sal), n. [L. seal, and salis, salt, bargain; this word exists in same relation to sal as sale to sell.] 1. The act of selling, the exchange of a commodity for an agreed-on price in money paid or to be paid, a transfer of the absolute or general property in a thing for a price in money.—2. Opportunity of selling, demand, market, as, there is no sale for these goods at present.

The countryman will be more industrious in sowing and rearing of all husbandry commodities, knowing that they shall have a ready sale for them at those times. Spenser.

3. Public sale to the highest bidder, or exposure of goods in a market or shop, auction.

Those that won the plate, and those that sold ought to be marked, so that they may never return in the race or to the end. Let M. Temple.

—Sale by inch of candle, a sale or auction where persons are allowed to bid during the time that a small piece of candle takes in burning.—On sale, for sale, to be bought or sold, offered to purchasers.

Sale (sal), n. [A Sax. word, cool, a shallow or willow.] A wicker basket; also, a basket-like net. Spenser.

Final cause; end; purpose; purpose of obtaining; as, the hero fights for the sake of glory; men labour for the sake of subsistence or wealth. — 2. Account; reason; cause; interest; regard to any person or thing. The plural is regularly used in such phrases as: 'For your fair sakes.' Shak. 'For both our sakes.' Shak. The sign of the genitive (possessive), is often omitted. Thus Shakspeare has 'For heaven sake'; 'For fashion sake,' &c.

I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake. Gen. viii. 11.

The word seems only to occur in such phrases as the above, having always for before it.

Saker (sá'kér), n. [Spelled also sacres, from Fr. sacres, a falcon, then a piece of ordnance; Sp. and Pg. sacros, from Ar. saghr, a sparrowhawk. It was customary to give the names of hawks to muskets and pieces of artillery.] 1. A hawk; a species of falcon. The name has sometimes been given to the lanner, but properly belongs to a distinct species, the Falco sacer, a European and Asiatic falcon, still used in falconry among the Asiatics. — 2. The same is also applied to a spirituous solution of carbonate of ammonia flavoured with aromatic.

Sai (sai) n. [Native name.] One of the most valuable timber trees of India, Shorea robusta, nat. order Dipterocarp. Extensive forests of it used to clothe the base of the southern slope of the Himalayas, but these have been much destroyed by tapping for the sake of a whitish, aromatic, transparent resin, used to caulk boats and ships, and also for incense. The sai forests are now protected by government. See SHOREA.

Salaam (sa-lam) n. [Per and Ar salaam,
Allah shalom, peace.] A conventional salu-

Salam (sa-lam) n. Same as SALAM.
Salamander (sa-lam-an-dar) n. [Fr. sa- lamandre, L. and Gr. salamandra, Gr. sa- lamandra, salamander.] The popular name of a genus (Salamandra) of amphibian reptiles, order Urodela, very closely allied to the newts, differing from them chiefly in having a cylindrical instead of a compressed tail, and by bringing forth their young alive. The salamanders have an elongated head like form (but differ from lizards in having gills in their early stages), four feet, and a long tail. The head is thick, the tongue broad, and the palatal teeth in two long series. The skin is warty, with many glands secreting a watery fluid, which the animal exudes when alarmed. As this fluid is injur-ous to small animals the salamanders have the reputation of extreme voraciousness, though they are in reality entirely harmless.

The best known species is the S. vulgaris, the common salamander of the south of Europe.

Common Salamander (Salamandra vulgaris).

It is about 6 to 8 inches long, is found in moist places under stones or the roots of trees, near the borders of springs, in deep woods, &c., and passes its life in concealment except at night or during rain. It is sometimes called the Spotted Salamander (S. ma- culosa), from the bright yellow stripes on its sides. There are various other species in Europe, Asia, and America. In America the name is often given to the menopome (Menopoma albigenuum). Salamanders feed on worms, slugs, snails, and insects. According to a superstition once very prevalent, salamanders sought the hottest fire to breed in, quenching it with the extreme frigidity of their body. Pliny tells us he tried the experiment, and the creature was burned to powder. It is probable that the absurd belief is due to the moisture above referred to as exuding from the skin. The salamander of the middle ages was a being in human shape which lived always in fire, a kind of fire-spirit. By some the newts are regarded as salamanders, under the name of Water or Aquatic Salamanders.—3 A pouched rat (Geomys pectus) found in Georgia and Florida. 3 A large iron poker, also, an iron plate used for cooking purposes. [Provincial].—4 A piece of metal fixed in a suitable handle, and heated, formerly used on board ships for the purpose of firing guns.
—Salamander's wool or salamander's hair,

pl. A native or inhabitant of Salamanga.
In the pl. the people of Salamanga.

Salama (sa-lam-a) n. A kind of fishing net, two corners of which are attached to the upper extremities of two long bamboos tied crosswise, their lower extremities being fastened to a bar on the raft, which acts as a hinge, a movable pole, arranged with a counterpoise as a sort of crane, supports the bamboos at the point of junction, and thus enables the fishermen to raise or depress the net at pleasure. The lower extremities of the net are guided by a cowl, which, being drawn towards the raft at the same time that the long bamboos are elevated by the crane and counterpoise, only a small portion of the net remains in the water, and is easily cleared of its contents by means of a landing net.

Salamstone (sa-lam-ston) n. A variety of amphibolite, which consists of small transparent crystals, generally six-sided prisms of pale-reddish and bluish colours. It is brought from Ceylon.

Salary (sa-lar-ri) n. [L. salarium, from sal, salt, originally salt-money, money given to buy salt, as part of the pay of Roman soldiers; hence, stipend, pay.] The recompense or consideration stipulated to be paid to a person periodically for services, usually a fixed sum to be paid by the year, half year, or quarter. When paid at shorter periods the recompense is usually called pay or wages; thus, a judge, governor, or teacher receives a salary, a labourer receives wages.

O this is here and salary, not revenge. Shaks.

Salary (sa-lar-ri) v. i. pret. & pp. salaried; pres. salari-ing. To pay a salary or stipend to; to attach salary to, as a salaried post.

As long as public teachers are salaried and responsible by the people there is very little chance of their becoming tyrants by force. Barlow.

Salary (sa-lar-ri) n. Saline. See T. Brown.
Salic (sal) n. [Lat. sal, salt, saline, benign;
this word stands in some relation to sal as salt to tell.] 1 The act of selling, the exchange of a commodity for an agreed-on price in money paid or to be paid, a transfer of the absolute or general property in a thing for a price in money.—2 Opportunity of selling, demand market, as, there is no sale for these goods at present.

The countryman will be more industrious in tillage, and mowing of all husbandry commodities, knowing that they shall have a ready sale for them at those times. Spenser.

3 Public sale to the highest bidder, or ex-posure of goods in a market or shop, auction.

Those that won the plate, and those that sold ought to be marked, so that they may never return to the race or to the sale. Sir W. Temple.

—Sale by cash of candle, a sale or auction where persons are allowed to bid during the time that a small piece of candle takes in burning.—On sale, for sale, to be bought or sold; offered to purchasers.

ported from Persia and Asia Minor. Salep occurs in commerce in small oval balls of a whitish-yellow colour, at times semi-transparent, of a horny aspect, very hard, with a faint peculiar smell, and a taste like that of gum-tragacanth, but slightly saline. It is much valued in the East for its supposed general stimulant properties, and is also esteemed as a nutritious food well suited to children and convalescents. For use it is ground into a fine powder, and mixed with boiling water, sugar and milk being added according to taste. As a diet drink it used to be considered very nutritious and wholesome in this country, and was sold in London at stalls ready prepared, as coffee, its substitute, now is.

Saleratus (sal-er'at-us), n. [For sal aeratus, lit. aerated salt.] The prepared carbonate of soda and salt used for mixing with the flour in baking, to evolve the carbonic acid gas on the addition of water, and so make the bread light. Bret Harte. [United States.]

Sale-room (sal'róm), n. A room in which goods are sold; specifically, an auction-room.

Salesman (sálz'man), n. One whose occupation is to sell goods or merchandise; specifically, a wholesale dealer, of whom there are various kinds in important commercial centres; as, a cattle, meat, butter, hide, hay, fish, or other salesman. Simmonds.—Dead salesman, a wholesale dealer in butcher-meat; one who disposes of consignments of dead meat by auction or other modes of sale.

Saliancoe, † Salianoe, † n. Assault or sally.

Spenser.

Salic (sál'ik), a. [Fr. salique.] A term applied to a law or code of laws belonging to the Salian Franks. One of the laws in this code excluded women from inheriting certain lands, probably because certain military duties were connected with the holding of those lands. In the fourteenth century females were excluded from the throne of France by the application of this law to the succession to the crown, and it is in this sense that the term salic law is commonly used.

Salicaceae (sal-i-ká'sé-é), n. pl. [L. salix, salix, a willow.] A nat. order of apetalous exogens, distinguished by a two-valved capsule, and numerous seeds tufted with long hairs. The species are trees or shrubs, inhabiting woods in the northern districts of Europe, Asia, and America. Only two genera are included in the order, Salix or willow, and Populus or poplar.

Salicaceous (sal-i-ká'shu-s), a. Of or relating to the willow, or the order Salicaceae.

Salicetum (sal-i-sá'tum), n. [L., from salix, a willow.] A willow plantation.

Salicin, Salicine (sál'i-sín), n. [L. salix, a willow.] (C₁₃H₁₆O₇). A bitter crystallizable substance extracted from willow barks and from that of the poplar. It possesses tonic properties analogous to those of quinine, and is a valuable stomachic bitter.

Salicornia (sal-i-kór'ní-a), n. [From L. sal, salt, and cornu, a horn.] A genus of plants, nat. order Chenopodiaceae, the species of which are known by the common name of glasswort or saltwort, and well distinguished by their jointed stems. They are mostly weeds inhabiting moist salt districts on the coasts of the north of Europe, Africa, and America. S. herbacea and S. radicans are natives of Great Britain. S. herbacea, and many other species, yield a great quantity of soda.

Salicylic (sal-i-sí'lik), a. [L. salix, a willow, and Gr. hyle, matter.] The name given to an acid (C₇H₅O₃) obtained from oil of wintergreen and from other sources, as salicin. It crystallizes in tufts of slender prisms. It has come into very general use as an antiseptic substance; and being devoid of poisonous properties it may be employed for preserving foods, &c., from decay.

Salience (sál'i-ens), n. The quality or condition of being salient; the quality or state of projecting or being projected; projection; protrusion.

The thickness and salience of the external frontal table remains apparent. Sir W. Hamilton.

Salient (sál'i-ent), a. [L. saliens, ppr. of salio, to leap.] 1. Moving by leaps; leaping; bounding; jumping. 'Frogs and salient animals.' Sir T. Browne.—2. Saliva (sa-lí'va), n. [L., akin to Gr. sialon, saliva. Comp. Gael. and Ir. seila, saliva, saliva, to drop, to distil, to spit.] The fluid which is secreted by the salivary glands, and which serves to moisten the mouth and tongue. The principal use of saliva is that of converting the starchy elements of the food into grape-sugar and dextrine. When discharged from the mouth it is called spittle. Saliva contains about 5 or 6 parts of solid matter to 95 or 99 of water, the chief ingredients being an organic matter named ptyalin and sulphocyanide of potassium. In its normal state its reaction is alkaline, but the degree of alkalinity varies, being greatest after meals. The parotid saliva is limpid, and serves to moisten the food in the process of mastication; the sub-maxillary and sub-lingual saliva is viscid, and is essential to deglutition and gustation.

Salival (sa-lí'val), a. Same as Salivary.

Salivant (sál'i-vant), a. [L. salivans. See SALIVATE.] Exciting salivation.

Salivant (sál'i-vant), n. That which produces salivation.

Sanctuarize (sangk-tú-a-ri), v. t. pret. & pp. sanctuarized; ppr. sanctuarizing. [From sanctuary.] To shelter by means of a sanctuary or sacred privileges.

No place, indeed, should murder sanctuarize. Shak.

Sanctuary (sangk-tú-a-ri), n. [Fr. sanctuaire; L. sanctuarium, from sanctus, sacred.]

1. A sacred or consecrated place; a holy spot; specifically, (a) in Script. the temple at Jerusalem, particularly the most retired part of it, called the Holy of Holies, in which was kept the ark of the covenant, and into which no person was permitted to enter except the high-priest, and that only once a year to intercede for the people. The same name was given to the corresponding part of the tabernacle in the wilderness. (b) A house consecrated to the worship of God; a place where divine service is performed; a church. Crowds in column'd sanctuaries. Tennyson. (c) The cella or sacred part of an Egyptian, Greek, or Roman temple. (d) In the Rom. Cath. Ch. the presbytery or that part of a church where the altar is placed. 2. A place of protection; a sacred asylum.

Our firesides must be our sanctuaries, our refuges from misfortune, our choice retreat from all the world. Goldsmith.

3. Right of affording such protection or shelter; the privilege attached to certain places in virtue of which criminals taking refuge in them are protected from the ordinary operation of the law. From the time of Constantine downwards certain churches have been set apart in many Catholic countries to be an asylum for fugitives from the hands of justice. In England, particularly down to the Reformation, any person who had taken refuge in a sanctuary was secured against punishment — except when charged with treason or sacrilege — if within the space of forty days he gave signs of repentance, and subjected himself to banishment. By the act 21 James I. xxviii., the privilege of sanctuary for crime was finally abolished. Various sanctuaries, however, for debtors continued to exist in and about London till 1697, when they too were abolished. In Scotland the Abbey of Holyrood House and its precincts still retain the privilege of giving sanctuary to debtors. When a person retires to the sanctuary he is protected against personal diligence, which protection continues for twenty-four hours; but to enjoy it longer the person must enter his name in the books kept by the bailie of the abbey. From the abolition of imprisonment for debt this sanctuary is no longer used.

These laws, whoever made them, bestowed on temples the privilege of sanctuary. Milton.

4. Refuge in a sacred place; shelter; protection. 'Yield me sanctuary.' Tennyson.

The admirable works of painting were made fuel for the fire; but some reliques of it took sanctuary under ground, and escaped the common draining. Dryden.

Sanctum (sangk'tum), n. [L.] A sacred place; a private retreat or room; as, an editor's sanctum. — Sanctum sanctorum, 'the holy of holies.' The innermost or holiest place of the Jewish tabernacle or temple. See HOLY.

Sanctus (sangk'tus), n. In music, an anthem beginning with the Latin word sanctus, holy.

Sanctus-bell (sangk'tus-bel), n. In the R. Cath. Ch. same as Sacring-bell.

Sand (sand), n. [A. Sax. sand; Dan. Sw. and G. sand, ícel. sandr, D. zand. Probably from same root as L. sabulum, sand, gravel.]

1. Fine particles of stone, particularly of siliceous stone in a loose state, but not reduced to powder or dust; a collection of siliceous granules not coherent when wet. Most of the sands which we observe are the ruins of disintegrated rocks, and are red, white, gray, or black, according to the rocks from which they were derived, such as granitic, porphyritic, and other crystalline rocks. Valuable metallic ores, as those of gold, platinum, tin, copper, iron, titanium, often occur in the form of sand or mixed with that substance. Pure siliceous sands are very valuable for the manufacture of glass, for making mortars, filters, ameliorating dense clay soils, for making moulds in founding and many other purposes. — 2. pl Tracts of land consisting of sand, like the deserts of Arabia and Africa; also, tracts of sand exposed by the ebb of the tide; as, the Libyan sands; the Solway sands. — 3. The sand in a sand-glass or hour-glass; hence, the time one has to live; period of life.

Now our sands are almost run. Shak.

The sands are numbered that make up my life. Shak.

Sand (sand), v. t. 1. To sprinkle with sand; specifically, to powder with sand, as a freshly painted surface, in order to make it resemble stone. See SANDED. — 2. To drive upon a sand-bank.

Travellers and seamen, when they have been sanded or dashed on a rock, for ever after fear most that mischance only, but all such dangers whatsoever. Burton.

Sandal (san'dal), n. [Fr. sandale, L. sandalium, from Gr. sandalion, sandalon.] 1. A kind of shoe, consisting of a sole fastened to the foot, generally by means of straps, Grecian and Roman Sandals.

crossed over and wound round the ankle. Originally sandals were made of leather, but they afterwards became articles of great luxury, being made of gold, silver, and other precious materials, and beautifully ornamented. — 2. The official shoe of a bishop or abbot. They were commonly made of red leather, and sometimes of silk or velvet richly embroidered. — 3. A tie or strap for fastening a shoe over the foot or round the ankle. 'Open-work stockings, and shoes with sandals.' Dickens.

Sandal (san'dal), n. Sandal-wood. 'Toya in lava, fane of sandal.' Tennyson.

Sandaliform (san'dal-i-form), a. Shaped like a sandal or slipper.

Sandalled (san'dald), p. and a. 1. Wearing sandals. — 2. Shaped like a sandal or slipper; having the appearance of a sandal; fastening with a sandal. 'Her sandalled shoes in an old threadbare velvet reticule.' Dickens.

Sandal-wood (san'dal-wúd), n. [Ar. sandal, from Skr. chandana, sandal-wood.] The wood of several species of the genus Santalum, natives of the East Indies and tropical islands of the Pacific Ocean. S. album is a low tree, having a general resemblance to privet. When the tree becomes old, the harder central wood acquires a yellow colour and a strong scent which is very fatal to insects. On this account it is used for making cabinets, &c., which are very suitable for the preservation of such articles as are subject to the ravages of insects. Yellow sandal-wood is the produce of a different species, S. Freycinetianum, a native of the Sandwich Islands and Indian Archipelago, and from these regions the Chinese import it, chiefly for the purpose of burning it both in their temples and in their houses. See SANTALUM. — Red sandal-wood, or red sanders-wood, is the produce of a tree of the genus Pterocarpus, the P. santalinus, a native of India. It is used as a dye-wood, and as a slight astringent in medicine. The colouring principle is called santaline. (See PTEROCARPUS.) The Adenanthura pavonina, a native of the East Indies, and allied to the acacias, the chips of which yield a deep red dye, is sometimes called red sandal-wood.

Sandarach (san'da-rak), n. [L. sandaraca, from Gr. sandarakh, sandarachē, a word of Oriental origin; Ar. sandarās, Per. sandarakh, Skr. sindūra, realgar.] 1. A resin in white tears, more transparent than those of mastic, which exudes from the bark of the sandarach-tree (Callitris quadrivalvis; Thya articulata of some botanists). (See next article.) It is used as pounce powder for strewing over paper erasures (see POUNCE), as incense, and for making a pale varnish for light-coloured woods. Called also Juniper-resin. — 2. In mineral, red sulphuret, or proto-sulphuret, of arsenic; realgar. Also spelled Sandarac.

Sandarach-tree (san'da-rak-trē), n. The Callitris quadrivalvis, a native of the mountains of Morocco. It is a large tree with straggling branches; the timber is fragrant, hard, durable, mahogany-coloured, and is largely used in the construction of mosques and similar buildings in the north of Africa. See SANDARACH.

Sand-bag (sand'bag), n. A bag filled with sand; as, (a) a bag of sand or earth, and used in a fortification for repairing breaches, &c. (b) A leathern cushion, tightly filled with fine sand, used by engravers to prop their work at a convenient angle, or to give free motion to a plate or cut in engraving curved lines, &c. (c) A form of ballast used in boats and balloons. (d) A bag of sand fastened to the end of a staff and formerly employed in the challenges of yeomen, instead of the sword and lance, the weapons of knights and gentlemen. Shak. (e) A bag of sand which used to be attached to a quintain (which see).

Sand-ball (sand'bal), n. A ball of soap mixed with fine sand for the toilet.

Sandbank (sand'bank), n. A bank of sand; especially, a bank of sand formed by tides or currents.

Sand-bath (sand'bat), n. 1. A vessel containing warm or hot sand, used as an equable heater for retorts, &c., in various chemical processes. — 2. In med. a form of bath in which the body is covered with warm or sea sand.

Sand-bed (sand'bed), n. In metal, the bed into which the iron from the blast-furnace is run; the floor of a foundry in which large castings are made.

Sand-blast (sand'blast), n. A method of engraving and cutting glass and other hard materials by the percussive force of particles of sand driven by a steam or air blast. Called also Sand-jet.

Sand-blind (sand'blind), a. Having a defect of sight, by means of which small particles appear to fly before the eyes; having imperfect sight.

O heavens, this is my true-begotten father! who being more than sand-blind, high gravel-blind, knows me not. Shak.

Sand-blindness (sand'blind-ness), n. State of being sand-blind.

Sand-box (sand'boks), n. 1. A box with a perforated top or cover for sprinkling paper with sand. — 2. A box filled with sand, usually placed in front of the driving-wheel of a locomotive, with a pipe to guide the sand to the rail when the wheels slip owing to frost, wet, &c. — 3. A tree or plant of the genus Hura, the H. crepitans. (See HURA.)

The fruits are of the shape shown in the cut, about the size of an orange, having a number of cells, each containing a seed. When ripe and dry they burst with a sharp report.

Fruit of the Sand-box Tree, (Hura crepitans).

Sand-boy (sand'boy), n. A boy employed in carrying or carting sand.

Sand-canal (sand'ka-nal), n. In zool. the tube by which water is conveyed from the exterior to the ambulacral or locomotive system of the Echinodermata.

Sand-corn (sand'korn), n. A grain of sand.

Sand-crab (sand'krab), n. See OCTOPODA.

Sand-crack (sand'krak), n. A fissure or perpendicular crack occurring in the hoof of a horse, the effect of which, if neglected, is to lame the horse.

Sand-drift (sand'drift), n. Drifting or drifted sand; a mound of drifted sand.

Sanded (sand'ed), p. and a. 1. Sprinkled with sand. 'The whitewashed wall, the nicely sanded floor.' Goldsmith. — 2. Covered with sand.

The river pours along
Restless, roaring dreadful down it comes;
Then o'er the sanded valley floating spreads. Thomson.

3. Of a sandy colour.

My hounds are bred out of the Spartan kind,
So few'd, so sanded, and their heads are hung
With ears that sweep away the morning dew. Shak.

4. Short-sighted. [Provincial English.]

Sand-eel (sand'ēl), n. A name common to a family (Ammodytidae) of apodal (teleostean) fishes, and more specifically to the members of the genus Ammodytes. The body is slender and cylindrical, somewhat resembling that of an eel, and varying from 4 inches to about 1 foot in length, of a beautiful silvery lustre, destitute of ventral fins, and the scales hardly perceptible; the head is compressed, and the upper jaw larger than the under. There are two British species, bearing the name of launce, viz. the Ammodytes tobianus, or wide-mouthed launce, and the A. alliciens or lancea, or small-mouthed launce. They are of frequent occurrence on our coasts, burying themselves in the sand to the depth of 6 or 7 inches during the time it is left dry by the ebb-tide, whence the former is dug out by fishermen for bait. They are delicate food.

The face of that lofty cape is composed of the soft and crumbling stone called sand-flag, which gradually yields to the action of the atmosphere, and becomes split into large masses. Sir W. Scott.

Sand-flea (sand'fē), n. A small amphipodous crustacean of the genus Talitrus (T. locusta), common along most sea-shores. The sand-fleas swim on their side when in the water, and leap with great activity on land. They are sometimes found in great swarms, especially amongst sea-weed cast up on the beach. Called also Beach-flea and Sand-hopper.

Sand-flood (sand'flood), n. A vast body of sand moving or borne along the deserts of Arabia. Brue.

Sand-fluke (sand'flook), n. See SAND-NECKER.

Sand-fly (sand'fli), n. A minute dipterous insect of the genus Simulium, family Tipulidae, and sub-order Nemocera. Their bite often causes painful swellings.

Sand-gall (sand'gal), n. Same as Sand-pipe.

Sand-glass (sand'glas), n. An hour-glass.

Sand-grass (sand'gras), n. Grass that grows on sandy soil as by the sea-shore. The name is peculiarly applied to those grasses which, by their wide-spreading and tenacious roots, enable the sandy soil to resist the encroachments of the sea.

The sand-grasses, Elymus arenarius, Arundo arenaria, are valuable binding weeds on shifty sandy shores. Hemfrey.

Sand-grouse (sand'grouse), n. A genus (Pterocles) of gallinaceous birds, family Tetraonidae, closely allied to the grouse. They are natives chiefly of the warm parts of Asia and Africa, and are most abundant in arid sandy plains. Two species, the banded sand-grouse (P. arenarius) and the phalaris sand-grouse (P. setarius) are found in the south of Europe.

Sand-heat (sand'hēt), n. The heat of warm sand in chemical operations.

Sand-hill (sand'hil), n. A hill of sand, or a hill covered with sand. 'The sand-hills of the sea.' Shelley.

Sand-hopper (sand'hop-ēr), n. A small crustacean animal of the genus Talitrus. See SAND-FLEA.

Sandiness (sand'i-ness), n. 1. The state of being sandy.

Let such pretenders suspect the sandiness and hollowness of their foundation. South.

2. The state of being of a sandy colour.

Sandish (sand'ish), a. Approaching the nature of sand; loose; not compact. 'Fresh sandish earth.' Evelyn.

Sandiver (san'di-vēr), n. [A corruption of Fr. sel de verre, salt of glass.] The saline scum which is cast up from the materials of glass in fusion, and floating on the top is scummed off. It is used, when pulverized, as a polishing substance. Called also Sand-ever and Glass-gall.

Sandix (san'diks), n. [L., from Gr. sandyx, a bright red colour.] An old term applied to red-lead prepared by calcining carbonate of lead. Written also Sandyx.

Sand-jet (sand'jet), n. Same as Sand-blast.

Sand-lance, Sand-launce (sand'lans), n. Same as Sand-eel.

Sand-lizard (sand'liz-ērd), n. A saurian reptile (Lacerta agilis or L. stirpium) found on sandy heaths in Great Britain. It is about 7 inches long, variable in colour, but generally sandy-brown on the upper parts, with darker blotches interspersed, and having black rounded spots with a yellow or white centre on the sides.

Sand-martin (sand'mār-tin), n. A species of swallow, the Hirundo riparia. It is regarded as the smallest of the British swallows, is brown above and white below, with a dark-brown band on the breast. It is named from building its nest in the sandy banks of rivers and in gravel-pits. Also called the Bank Swallow.

Sand-mole (sand'mōl), n. See BATHYERGUS.

Sand-myrtle (sand'mēr-tl), n. The American name for a plant of the genus Lero-phylum, nat. order Ericaceae (heathworts), a native of New Jersey. It is a low, branching, evergreen shrub, with terminal clusters of small white flowers.

Sand-neck (sand'nek-ēr), n. A local name for a variety of plaice (Platessa limandoides). Called also Sand-fluke.

Sandoricum (san-dor'ik-kum), n. [From santor, the Malay name of the tree.] A genus of plants, nat. order Meliaceae. S. indicum, the only species, is an elegant tree of considerable size, found in the Molucca and Philippine Islands, as well as in the southern parts of India. The fruit is acid, and may be mixed with syrups to make cooling drinks. The root is bitter and is used in medicine.

Sand-paper (sand'pā-pēr), n. Paper covered on one side with a fine gritty substance for smoothing and polishing wood-work.

Sand-picture (sand'pik-tūr), n. A picture formed by arranging sand of various tints on a glutinous ground so that the general effect is similar to that of a coloured picture.

Sand-pipe (sand'pīp), n. In geol. a name given to long, perpendicular, cylindrical hollows, tapering to a point, penetrating sometimes deeply into the chalk, and so called from being filled with sand, gravel, or clay. Such pipes may have taken their origin from the rotatory motion of stones drilling holes in the chalk, but they have probably been continued by the slow action of water charged with carbonic acid penetrating the holes, and perhaps deepened in modern times by the action of humic acid derived from the roots of trees. Called also Sand-gall.

Sandpiper (sand'pī-pēr), n. A name applied to several gullatorial birds of the family Longirostris, and of the genera Tringa, Totanus, Pelidna, Actitis, &c. They are all shore birds allied to the snipe, plover, curlew, godwit, &c., with whom they constitute the family Scolopacidae of some writers. The knot (Tringa canutus), known variously as the red sandpiper or ash-coloured sandpiper, in accordance with the varying hue of its plumage, is about 10 inches in length, appearing off our coasts in great flocks in winter. The common sandpiper or summer-pipe (Totanus hypoleucos) visits us in summer. The green sandpiper (Totanus ochropus), on the contrary, leaves us for the north in summer. The little sandpiper or little stint (Tringa minuta), an Indian and South African bird, is occasionally seen in Britain. The purple sandpiper (Tringa maritima), a native of Greenland, Spitzbergen, &c., is also a summer visitant. The dunlin, greenshank, and redshank are also known as sandpipers. Sand-pipers of various species are abundant in North America, and in winter in the West Indies.

Sand-prey, Sand-pride (sand'prā, sand'prīd), n. The mud-lamprey (the Ammocoetes branchialis). It rarely exceeds 6 or 7 inches in length, is of a yellowish-brown colour, has a horse-shoe shaped mouth, and is considered peculiar to the rivers of England and Scotland.

Sand-pump (sand'pūmp), n. A cylindrical metallic case or tube having at the bottom a valve opening inwardly and used for removing the sand which collects in the bore when a well, &c., is being drilled. On the drill being temporarily removed the sand-pump is lowered, the water and dirt force up the valve and enter the tube, the valve dropping again to prevent their return. This being repeated again and again the tube becomes filled, on which it is drawn to the surface and emptied.

Sand-rock (sand'rok), n. A rock composed of cemented sand.

Sand-shot (sand'shot), n. Small cast-iron balls, such as grape, canister, or case, cast in sand, larger balls being cast in iron moulds.

Sand-smelt (sand'smelt), n. A fish, the Atherina presbyter. Called also Atherine. See ATHERINE.

Sand-star (sand'stār), n. A star-fish of the genus Ophiura, order Ophiuroidea, having five long slender arms attached to a circular disc.

Sandstone (sand'stōn), n. Stone composed of agglutinated grains of sand, which may be calcareous, siliceous, or of any other mineral nature. Sandstone is in most cases chiefly composed of particles of quartz, united by a cement. The cement is in variable quantity, and may be calcareous or marly, argillaceous or argillo-ferruginous, or even siliceous. The grains of quartz are sometimes scarcely distinguishable by the naked eye, and sometimes are equal in size to a nut or an egg, as in those sandstones called conglomerates, or sometimes pudding-stone or breccia. The texture of some sandstones is very close, while in others it is very loose and porous. Some sandstones have a slaty structure, and have been called sandstone slate. In colour sandstone varies from gray to reddish-brown, in some cases uniform, in others variegated. In addition to quartz some sandstones contain grains of felspar, flint, and siliceous slate, or plates of mica. Some sandstones are ferruginous, containing an oxide or the carbonate of iron. Sandstone, though a secondary rock, has been formed at different periods and under different circumstances, and is hence associated with different rocks or formations. It is in general distinctly stratified, and the beds horizontally arranged, but sometimes they are much inclined, or even vertical. Sandstone in some of its varieties is very useful in the arts, and is often known by the name of freestone. When sufficiently solid it is employed as a building stone. Some varieties are used as millstones for grinding meal, or for wearing down other materials preparatory to a polish, and some are used for whetstones.—New red sandstone, in geol., a series of brick-red strata lying immediately above the Permian strata. The new red sandstone system, as at first designated, included two groups of rocks, the one containing fossils belonging to the palaeozoic age, the other inclosing mesozoic remains. These have, therefore, been separated, and the name Permian given to the older and lower group, and that of triassic or new red sandstone to the newer and upper. (See PERMIAN, TRIASSIC.) The trias of England consists of red sandstones, conglomerates, and marls, with a small admixture of dolomite and important beds of rock-salt. In Germany it contains the Muschelkalk.—Old red sandstone, a group of strata, chiefly sandstones and conglomerates, whose universally red colour suggested their name. They are largely developed on the borders of Wales, in the Cambrian district, the central valley of Scotland, along the shores of the Moray Firth, the county of Caithness, and the Orkneys. The lower strata pass into the upper Silurian, the upper beds pass into the carboniferous, a middle group being recognized only in the north of Scotland. Fossils are few in comparison to the thickness of the strata. But from the fossils and the red colour of the beds Professor A. C. Ramsay infers that they were formed in land-locked continental basins; they would thus represent the great land surfaces which replaced the Silurians, and were in turn replaced by the carboniferous seas. The marine deposits of the old red sandstone period are represented by the Devonians of England and the Continent; Devonian and old red sandstone are not therefore synonymous. In Russia the same beds contain Devonian and old red sandstone fossils. Perhaps the name may disappear, the members of the group being referred to the Silurian and carboniferous formations, with which they are respectively conformable. See DEVONIAN.

Sand-storm (sand'storm), n. A violent commotion of sand caused by wind.

Sand-sucker (sand'suk-ēr), n. The same as Sand-necker.

Sand-tube (sand'tūb), n. A tube made of sand; specifically, a vitrified tube of sand produced by lightning; a fulgurite.

Sand-wasp (sand'wasp), n. A hymenopterous insect of the genus Ammophila, belonging to a group which, from their peculiar habits, are termed Possories or diggers. The sand-wasp inhabits sunny banks in sandy situations, running among grass, &c., with great activity, and continually vibrating its antennae and wings. The female is armed with a sting.

Sandwich (sand'wich), n. [After an Earl of Sandwich, who brought it into fashion.] 1. Two thin slices of bread, plain or buttered, with some savoury food, as sliced or potted meat, fish, or the like, flavoured with mustard, &c., between.

Claret, sandwich, and an appetite.
 Are things which make an English evening pass.
Byron.

Hence—2. Anything resembling a sandwich; something dissimilar placed between two other things, as a man carrying two advertising-boards, one before and one behind, a man placed between two ladies, or the like.

A pale young man with feeble whiskers and a stiff white neckcloth came walking down the lane in sandwich—having a lady, that is, on each arm. Thackeray.

Sandwich (sand'wich), v. t. To make into a sandwich; to insert between something dissimilar, in the manner of the meat in a sandwich; to fit between other parts. [Colloq.]

Sand-worm (sand'wōrm), n. A name applied to various species of annelides that inhabit sand.

Sandwort (sand'wōrt), n. The common name of several British species of plants of the genus Arenaria, nat. order Caryophyllaceae. They are found growing in sandy situations, but are of no value.

Sandy (sand'y), a. 1. Consisting of or abounding with sand; full of sand; covered or sprinkled with sand; as, a sandy desert or plain; a sandy road or soil. 'The sandy hour-glass.' Shak.—2. Resembling sand; hence, unstable; shifting; not firm or solid.

Favour, so bottomed upon the sandy foundation of personal respects only, cannot be long lived. Barrow.

3. Of the colour of sand; of a yellowish-red colour; as, sandy hair.

Sandy-laverock (sand'lā-ver-ok), n. A bird, the sanderling. Sir W. Scott [Scotch.] Sandyz. See SANDIX.

Sane (sān), a. [L. sanus, sound, whole, healthy. Same root as Gr. saos, sōs, safe and sound.] 1. Mentally sound; not disordered in mind; not deranged; having the regular exercise of reason and other faculties of the mind; as, a sane person; a person of a sane mind.

I woke sane, but well-nigh close to death. Tennyson.

2. Healthy. [Rare.]

Saneness (sān'ness), n. State of being sane or of sound mind; sanity.

Sang (sang), pret. of sing.

[After Sans-culotte, a French term.] A genus of Illinoensis plants found on the coasts of Western Africa, of Ceylon, and other eastern islands as well as of India. They have sword-shaped sheathing leaves and simple spikes of small Sans-culottis agilis.

greenish flowers. The species are remarkable for the strength and fineness of the fibres of their leaves, which are made into bow-strings by the natives, and might be manufactured into cordage, especially the fibres of the leaves of S. Sans-culottis, abundant in the southern parts of India. (See BOWSTRING-REED.) S. agilis, a native of Ceylon, is often confounded with this species, but is much smaller.

Sanskrit, Sanskrit (san'skrit) a. [From sans — (Dr. H.) with, and krit, done, made, perfected, from kr, to make. The union of sans with kr produces a compound which signifies to polish, adorn, to perfect, and the name was given to express its superiority to the vernacular dialect, the Prakrit (that is, common, natural).] The ancient language of the Hindus, being that in which most of their vast literature is written, from the oldest portion of the Veda (supposed to date from about 1500 B.C.) downward, though it has long ceased to be a living and spoken language. It is one of the Aryan or Indo-European family of tongues, and may be described as an older sister of the Persian, Greek, and Latin, Teutonic, Slavonic, and Celtic tongues. It stands in the same relation to the modern Aryan languages of India as Latin stands to the Romance languages. It is a highly inflected language, having in this respect many resemblances to Greek. To philologists it has proved perhaps the most valuable of tongues, indeed, it was only after it became known to Europeans (towards the end of last century) that philology began to assume the character of a science. Its supreme value is due to the transparency of its structure, and its freedom from the corrupting and disguising effect of phonetic change, and from obliteration of the original meaning of its vocabularies. The earliest Sanskrit of the Veda differs considerably from that of the later literature, and which is still employed for literary purposes.

Sanskritist, Sanskritist (sank'rit-ist), n. A person distinguished for attainments in Sanskrit.

Santalum (san-to-lá-sé-é), n. pl. A nat. order of apetalous angiospermous plants. They are shrubs or herbs, often parasitic on roots or branches, with opposite or alternate stipulate leaves, and a one-celled ovary with dry or fleshy albumen. In the form of woods the genus are found in Europe and North America, in Australia, the East Indies, and the South Sea Islands they exist as large shrubs or small trees. The most valuable genus is Santalum (which see).

Santalum (san-to-lá-sé), n. The colouring matter of red sandal or sanders wood, which may be obtained by evaporating the alcoholic infusion to dryness. It is a red resin, fusible at 212°, and is very soluble in acetic acid, as well as in alcohol, essential oils, and alkaline lyes.

Santalum (san-to-lá-sé), n. [L. See SAPPAL-WOOD.] A genus of plants, nat. order Santalaceæ, and the type of that order. One or more species yield the sandal-wood of commerce. See SAPPAL-WOOD.

Santur (san'tur), n. An occasional spelling of Santoor.

Santhos (san'th), n. An Indian measure for land, varying all over the country. In some districts it is as much as can be ploughed by two bullocks, in some by three, and in some by four.

Santon, Santon (san'ton, san'ton), n. An eastern priest, a kind of dervish, regarded by the people as a saint.

The dervish and other ascetics or enthusiasts express their zeal by turning round as long together, and with such softness, as will hardly be credited. See 7. Notes.

Santonio Acid (san-ton'io a-sid), n. Same as Santonin (which see).

Santonin, Santonin (san'ton-nin), n. (C₁₄H₁₀O₄) A proximate vegetable principle, possessing acid properties, obtained from the seeds of the Artemisia santonica, or southernwood. It is colourless, crystallizable, and soluble in alcohol, and in the fixed and volatile oils, and is one of the most efficacious vermifuges.

Santonin (san'ton-nin), n. An argillaceous mineral occurring on the island of Santon, yielding an excellent cement. It consists of 45 per cent silica, 54 ferric oxide, 123 alumina, 07 manganese oxide, 23 lime, 21 potash, 47 soda, with traces of common salt, sodic sulphate, and organic matter.

Santoni, Santoni-wood (san-tó-ni, san-tó-ni-wood), n. An excellent timber for ship-building, obtained from the Caryocarpus santoni and C. tomentosus, nat. order Rhizophoraceæ, which yield also the delicious sonari nuts. They are natives of tropical America. See CARYOCARPUS.

Sap (sap), n. [A. Sax. sap, D. sap, L.G. sapp, juice; Ice. sap, Dan. and G. sap, juice, sap. By some the Anglo-Saxon, Dutch, and Low-German forms are derived from L. saps, must boiled thick.] 1. The juice or fluid which circulates in all plants, being as indispensable to vegetable life as the blood to animal life. It is the first product of the digestion of plant food, and contains the elements of vegetable growth in a dissolved condition. The absorption of nutriment from the soil is effected by the minute root-hairs and papillae, the absorbed nutriment being mainly composed of carbonic acid and nitrogenous compounds dissolved in water. This ascending, or as it is termed crude sap, is apparently transmitted through the long cells in the vascular tissue of the stem and branches to the leaves, passing from cell to cell by the process known as endosmosis. In the leaves is effected the process of digestion or assimilation with the following results:—(a) the chemical decomposition of the oxygenated matter of the sap, the absorption of carbon dioxide (carbonic acid), and the liberation of pure oxygen at the ordinary atmospheric temperature. (b) A counter operation by which oxygen is absorbed from the air, and carbon dioxide exhaled. (c) The transformation of the remaining crude sap into organic substances which enter into the composition of the plant. This change is effected in the chlorophyll cells of the leaves under the influence of light, and the assimilated, or as it is termed elaborated sap, descends through the branches and stem to the growing parts of the plant requiring the same, there to be used up, after undergoing a series of changes included under the name metabolism, or to form deposits of reserve material lodged in various parts for future use. The ascent of the sap is one of the most wonderful phenomena of spring, and apparently depends not so much on the state of the weather, for it begins in the depth of winter, as on the plant having had its sufficient term of rest, and being, therefore, constrained by its very nature to renewed activity.—2. The juice or fluid in any substance, the presence of which is characteristic of a healthy, fresh, or vigorous condition. 'Blood.' 'Did I drain the purple sap from her sweet brother's body?' Shak. 3. The albumen of a tree, the exterior part of the wood, next to the bark; sap-wood.

Sap (sap), n. A simpleton, a ninny; a milk-cop. [Scotch and school slang.]

He seems to a milk sap, w' a head too heavy for a fiery frontal lamp. Sh. W. 2.

Sap (sap), v. t. To act like a sap; to play the part of a ninny or a soft fellow. [Slang.]

'They say he is the cleverest boy in the school. But then he saps.'—In other words, said Mr. D., with proper sarcasm, gravity, 'he understands he was sent to school to learn his lessons, and he wastes them. You call that sapping. I call it doing his duty.' Lord Lytton.

Sap (sap), v. t. pret. & pp. sapped; ppr. sapping. [Fr. saper, from saps, a kind of bill or mattock, it saps, a spade, sappers, a mattock, from L.L. saps, a mattock.] 1. To cause to fall or render unstable by digging or wearing away the foundation, to undermine.

Not only their dwellings were, but sapped by time, Their houses fell upon their household gods. Dryden.

2. To subvert by removing the foundation of; to destroy as if by some secret, hidden, or invisible process, as intrigue and corruption sap the constitution of a free government.

'Sapping a solemn creed with toilsome sneer.' Byron. 'The grief that saps the mind.'

Tennyson.—3. Sapped, to pierce with saps.

Sap (sap), v. t. To proceed by secretly undermining.

Both assaults are carried on by sapping. Taylor.

Sap (sap), n. [Fr. saps. See above.] Sapped, a narrow ditch or trench by which approach is made to a fortress or besieged place when within range of fire. The trench is formed by trained men (sappers), who place gabions as a cover, filled with the earth taken from the trench along the intended line of parapet, the earth excavated, after the gabions have been filled, being thrown towards the fortress, to form a parapet capable of resisting artillery. The single sap has only a single parapet; the double has one on each side. A sap is usually made by four men working together, and is generally a dangerous operation.

Sapedillo (sap-a-dí-lo), n. Same as Sapedillo.

Sapajou, Sajou (sap-a-jó, sá-jó), n. [Fr. sapajou, sajou, Br. sapajou.] The name generally given to a group of South American platyrrhine, prehensile-tailed monkeys, including fifteen or sixteen species, whose the wrapper (Cebus apella). The fur is rather rich, inclining to olive, and the face is bordered with a paler circle, varying considerably in shading and breadth. This species has been known to breed in confinement. The apajous are very active, and climb well. They are small in size, playful in disposition, leading a gregarious life, and feeding chiefly on fruits and insects.

Saffan-wood (sa-pán-wú), n. See SAPPAN-WOOD.

Sap-ball (sap-bál), n. A local name for those species of Polygort that grow on trees, but more specifically applied to Polygort apajou, a species, abounding on decayed oak-trees, the stems of which are sometimes used as a foundation for tennis-balls. It is sometimes used for racquet-croquet.

Sap-colour (sap-kol-ér), n. An expressed vegetable juice impregnated by slow evaporation, for the use of painters, as sap-green, &c.

Saps, Saps (saps), n. Saps. [Scotch.]

Sap-sap (sap-sap), n. Saps. A scam about a foot long, used in tapping to close the crevices between the gables before the parrot is made.

Sapful (sap-fúl), n. Full of sap, containing Capitulum.

Sap-green (sap-grén), n. A pigment prepared by evaporating the juice of the berries of the Rhamnus cathartica, or buckthorn, to dryness, mixed with lime. It is soluble in water; acids redder it, but the alkalies and alkaline earths restore the green colour. It is used by water-colour painters as a green pigment. Called also Bladder-green.

Sapped fellow (sapped), n. A blockhead; a stupid fellow. [Slang.]

Sapless (sa-plés), n. [Or. sapless, sapless, sapless.] In a state of two oak-branches of the lower limb and foot.

Saphonous (sa-fón-us), n. Of or pertaining to the saphens; as, the saphonous veins or nerves.

Sapid (sap-id), n. [L. sapidus, from saps, to taste (saps inspired).] Having the power of affecting the organs of taste, possessing savor or relish, tasteful; savoury.

That cannot make the taste moist, do make the food with taste. Sh. W. 2.

Sapidity (sa-pí-dí-ti), n. The quality of being sapid; the power of stimulating or pleasing the palate, tastefulness; savour; relish. 'Inquisitive and void of all sapidity.' Sh. T. 4.

Sapiness (sap-id-ness), n. Same as Sapidity.

When the lunatics finished the sapiness and relish of the food-pots, they began to taste and to rumour. J. Taylor.

Sapient (sá-pi-ent), n. [Fr. from L. sapientia, wisdom, from saps, to taste, to know.] The quality of being sapient; wisdom; sagaciousness; knowledge.

Sapienter and lucy.

Immense, and all his father in his chain. Shak.

To spare the folks that gave him his pain. Shak.

Sapient (sá-pi-ent), n. [L. sapientia, sapientia, wisdom, derived, pp. of saps, to taste, to know, to be wise.] Wise; sage, discerning. [Now generally ironical, or used of affected wisdom.]

No Saxon ever looked so sapient as he does when he is on the point of making a but, or indignantly plucking a hairpin or hairpin. Dr. Keats.

To shake his sapient head and give

The fit he cannot cure a maim. Mac. Drum.

Saps, Saps, sagacious, knowing, wise, discerning.

Sapiential (sá-pi-ent-shál), n. Affording wisdom or instructions for wisdom. Sp. Hall, J. Taylor [Rare.]

Sapientially (sá-pi-ent-shál-ly), adv. In a sapiential or wise manner. Sant.

Sapiently (sá-pi-ent-ly), adv. In a sapient manner; wisely; sagaciously; sagely.

Sapindaceæ (sap-in-dá-sé-é), n. pl. A nat. order of polytetalous dicotyledonous. It consists of trees or shrubs with erect or climbing stems, inhabitants of most parts of the tropics, more especially of South America and India. The leaves are usually alternate, simple or compound, and the flowers often irregular. In this order, although the leaves, branches, and other organs are often poisonous in various degrees, yet the fruit and seeds are edible and wholesome. The litchi and longan, favourite fruits in China, are produced by the genus Nephelium. Several other genera bear fruits that are eaten in Japan and Brazil. The typical genus is Rapindus (which see).

Capacit Sapajou (Cebus apajou) characteristics it is exceedingly difficult property to define. Among the species may be named the Cebus fuscus, or horned apajou (also called horned capacin), the C. maculatus, and C. apajou, often called the capacin. One of the most common species is Sapindaceous (sap-in-dé-shus), a. Pertaining to plants of the order Sapindaceae.

Sapindus (sa-pín-dus), n. (Contr. from sapo Indicus, or Indic soap. The aril which surrounds the seed of S. saponaria is used as soap in America.) A genus of plants, nat. order Sapindaceae, containing about forty species found in the tropical parts of the Old and New World. They are trees having entire pinnate leaves, with the inflorescence in racemes or terminal panicles. The berries are red and saponaceous, on which account they have been employed for washing cloths of various kinds in the West Indies, the continent of America, Java, and India. The fleshy part of these berries is viscid, and in drying assumes a shining transparent appearance, wherefore they are frequently used as beads for necklaces and rosaries. When rubbed with water this fleshy part forms a lather like soap, whence their name of soap-berries, often extended to the plant. This is owing to the presence of a principle called saponine (which see). The bark and root have similar properties, and have been employed for the same purpose as well as medicinally in the countries where the plant is indigenous.

Sapindus Saponaria.

When rubbed with water this fleshy part forms a lather like soap, whence their name of soap-berries, often extended to the plant. This is owing to the presence of a principle called saponine (which see). The bark and root have similar properties, and have been employed for the same purpose as well as medicinally in the countries where the plant is indigenous.

Sapinum (sá-pi-nm), n. (From Celtic sap, fat, in allusion to the unctuous excretion from the wounded trunk.) A genus of plants, nat. order Euphorbiaceae. S. saponarium is a native of the woods of Carthage. The juice of this species, as well as that of S. indicum, is highly poisonous.

Sapless (sá'les), a. 1. Destitute of sap, dry, withered. 'A withered vine, that droops his sapless branches to the ground.' Shak. 2. Destitute of healthy vital force.

New sapless on the verge of death he stands.

Dryden.

Sapling (sáp'ling), n. A young tree full of sap.

What planter will attempt to yoke A sapling with a falling oak.

Shak.

Applied sometimes to a young person.

Peace, tender sapling; thou art made of tears.

Shak.

Sapodilla (sap-ó-dil'la), n. [D. sapotilla, Sp. sapotilla, sapotilla, from Mexican sapotil.] A tree of the genus Achras, the A. Sapota, nat. order Sapotaceae, and found in the West Indies. It is large and straight, and runs to a considerable height without any branches, with a dark gray bark, very much chapped. The fruit resembles a bergamot pear in shape and size. The bark of the sapodilla is used in medicine as an astringent, and the seeds of the fruit (sapodilla plum) are used as a diuretic. The fruit is often called mamey, and is much prized as an article of diet.

Sapodilla (Achras Sapota).

Saponaceous (sap-ó-ná'shus), a. [From L. sapo saponis, soap.] Soapy; resembling soap; having the qualities of soap. Saponaceous bodies are compounds of an acid and a base, and are in reality a kind of salt.

Saponaceous (sap-ó-ná'shus), a. The state of being saponaceous.

Saponaria (sap-ó-ná'ria), n. [From L. sapo, saponis, soap.] A genus of annual and perennial herbs, chiefly natives of Europe, nat. order Caryophyllaceae. S. officinalis (common soapwort) is a native of Britain, growing in meadows and shady places. It is a smooth plant with large pink cymose flowers. The whole plant is bitter, and when bruised and agitated in water it raises a lather like soap, which washes greasy spots out of clothing. It has also been used in syphilis.

Saponary (sap-ó-ná'ria), a. Saponaceous.

Saponifiable (sap-ó-ní-fí-á-bil), a. Capable of being saponified or converted into soap.

Saponification (sap-ó-ní-fí-á'shún), a. Conversion into soap, the process in which fatty substances, through combination with an alkali, form soap. In an extended sense the term is applied to the resolution of all others and analogous substances into acids and alcohols.

Saponify (sap-ó-ní-fí), v.t. pret. & pp. saponified; pp. saponifying. [L. sapo, saponis, soap, and ficio, to make.] To convert into soap by combination with an alkali.

Saponina Saponin (sap-ó-ní-n), a. [C₁₂H₂₂O₁₁] A non-crystalline vegetable principle found in the root of Saponaria officinalis, and many other plants. It is white, amorphous, and has a taste first sweet, then astringent, and finally acrid. It is a powerful sternutatory. It is soluble in water, and its solution, even when much diluted, froths on being agitated like a solution of soap.

Saponite (sap-ó-nít), a. A hydrous silicate of magnesia and alumina. It occurs in soft, soapy, amorphous masses, filling veins in serpentine and carlin in trap-rock.

Saper (sá'per), a. [L.] Taste, savour; relish, the power of affecting the organs of taste.

There is some saper in all ailments.

Str. T. Brown.

Saporine (sap-ó-rí-n), a. [Fr. saporine, sap, sapor, the taste or flavour of a thing, and fines, to make.] Having the power to produce taste, producing taste, flavour or relish.

Saporificious (sap-ó-rí-fí-shus), a. Quality of being saporine.

Saporosity (sap-ó-rí-fí-tí), a. The quality of a body by which it excites the sensation of taste.

Saporous (sap-ó-rus), a. [L. saporus, tasting well, from sapor, savour.] Having flavour or taste; yielding some kind of taste.

Sapota (sa-pó'ta), n. Is bot. the specific name of a tree or plant of the genus Achras, the A. Sapota. See SAPODILLA.

Sapotaceae (sap-ó-tá-sé-á), n. pl. An order of plants belonging to the polycarpous group of monocotyledonous exogens. It consists of trees and shrubs which frequently abound in a milky juice, which may be used for alimentary purposes. They have alternate undivided leaves, small solitary or clustered axillary flowers, perfect stamens, opposite to the corolla lobes or double their number, a superior ovary with two or more cells, each containing a solitary ovule, and a baccate or drupeous fruit. They are chiefly natives of India, Africa, and America. Some of the species produce eatable fruits, as the sapodilla plum, mamey apple, star apple, medlar of Surinam, &c. The fruit and seeds of some species abound in oil, which is solid like butter, and has a mild pleasant flavour. One of the most important species is the Ipomoea Gutta, which produces the gutta percha of commerce. The bark of one species of Achras is astringent and tonic, and has been recommended as a substitute for quinine. See SAPODILLA.

Sapodilla-tree, Sapodilla-tree (sap-ó-dil-ó-tré), See SAPODILLA.

Sappen-wood (sá-pen-wúd or sa-pen'wúd), n. A dyewood produced by a species of Camptopila (C. Sappen). It yields a good red colour, which, however, is not easily fixed.

Sapper, Sappers (sá'pér), n. A mineral, called also Sapona and Dithion. See HY-ANTH.

Sapper (sá'pér), n. 1. One who saps. — 2. MIN. the designation of a private soldier in the Royal Engineers. Formerly the non-commissioned officers and privates of that corps received the general appellation of the Royal Sappers and Miners, which is now no longer used. Their duties consist in building fortifications, in executing field works, and in performing similar operations under the direction of their superior officers.

Sapphic (sá'fik), a. 1. Pertaining to Sappho, a Grecian poetess; as, Sapphic odes; Sapphic verse. — 2. In poet. applied to a kind of verse, said to have been invented by Sappho, consisting of eleven syllables in five feet, of which the first, fourth, and fifth are trochees, the second a spondee, and the third a dactyl. The Sapphic strophe consists of three Sapphic verses followed by an Adonia. Sapphic (sá'fik), n. A Sapphic verse. Minor.

Sapphire (sá'fir), n. [L. sapphirus, Gr. sappheiros, of Eastern origin, Heb. sappir, Ar. safir] 1. A precious stone, next in hardness and value to the diamond, belonging to the corundum class, which embraces the ruby, the oriental emerald, the oriental topaz and the emerald, and composed essentially of crystallized alumina. Sapphires are found in various places, as at Paga, Calicut, Ceylon, and Ceylon, in Asia; and Bohemia and Silesia, in Europe. The sapphire proper is a beautiful transparent stone of various shades of blue colour. It was one of the stones in the breastplate of the Jewish high-priest, and among the Greeks it was sacred to Jupiter. — Asteriated sapphire has in the midst of it a star of bright rays, resulting from its crystalline structure. — Chrysois sapphire, a variety, sometimes translucent and nearly limpid, reflecting slight tints of blue and red, and sometimes showing pearly reflections. — Giant sapphire, a beautiful variety with a pinkish or bluish opalescence, and a peculiar play of light. — Green sapphire, the emerald. — Red sapphire, the oriental ruby. — Violet sapphire, the oriental amethyst. — White or limpid sapphire, a columnar or grayish and transparent or translucent variety, sometimes sold as diamond. — Yellow sapphire, the oriental topaz. See CORDON-ROUGE. — 2. The colour of the sapphire; blue.

A lover emerald twinkles in the gem.

And greater sapphires make into the sea. Farquhar.

2. In her. same as Asure.

Sapphirine (sá'fir-in), a. Resembling sapphire; sapphire. 'The sapphire blaze.' Gray.

Sapphirine (sá'fir-in), a. Resembling sapphire, made of sapphire, having the qualities of sapphire. 'A lovely sapphirine blue.' Byss.

Sapphirine (sá'fir-in), a. A blue variety of spinel (which see).

Sappiness (sá'pí-nis), n. The state or quality of being sappy or full of sap; succulence; juiciness.

Sapple (sá'p), n. A lye of soap and water; caustic. [Scottish.]

Judge of my feelings, when I saw them exhibit (the clothes) to jugglers between their hands, above the sapple. Colt.

Sapodilla (sap-ó-dil'la), n. Same as SAPODILLA.

Sappy (sá'p), a. [A Sax. sappy. See SAP.] 1. Abounding with sap; juicy, succulent.

But these, the fed with careful diet,

Are neither green nor sappy;

Half-connections of the garden centre.

The sappiness lack unhappy. Farquhar.

2. Young; not firm; weak. 'When he had passed this weak and sappy age.' Hayward.

3. Weak in intellect.

Sappy (sá'p), a. [Comp. L. sapis, to taste.]

Moist, tainted, sweet.

Saprolagiales (sap-ro-lá-gí-á-les), n. pl. [Gr. sapros, rotten, and lagmos, an edge, a border.]

A natural order of coniferoids, of doubtful affinity, with the habits of moulds and the fructification of algae. They are nearly colourless, and grow on dead and living animals, and are most destructive to fish and other animals confined in aquaria.

Sap-roller (sá'ró-ler), n. A large galleon 8 feet long, and rendered bullet-proof by being filled with another galleon of less diameter as well as with fusils. It is rolled before him by a sapper to protect him from the fire of the enemy.

Saprophagous (sa-pro-fá-gus), n. [Gr. sapros, rotten, putrid, and phago, to eat.] A member of a tribe of coleopterous insects, comprising such as feed on animal and vegetable substances in a state of decomposition.

Saprophagous (sa-pro-fá-gus), a. [See SAPROPHAGOUS.] Feeding on substances in a state of decomposition.

Saprophyte (sá'p-rí-fí), n. [Gr. sapros, rotten, and phyton, a plant.] A plant that grows on decaying vegetable matter.

In parasites and plants growing on decaying vegetable matter (saprophytes) which are destitute of chlorophyll, the scales are the only solid structures of the vegetative parts. Shak.

Saprophytic (sá'p-rí-fí-tí), a. Pertaining to saprophytes.

Saprophytism (sa-pro-fit-izm) n. The state of being saprophytic; the state of living on decaying vegetable matter. See SAPROPHYTES.

Sap-rot (sap-ro't) n. A disease of timber; dry rot (which see).

Sapote (sa-po'te) n. (Corruption of S. schomburgkii - Schomburgk, in serape, and stager, green chemo.) A kind of hard chemo, made in Saurashtra, having a greenish colour, and flavoured with molasses.

Sap-skill (sap-skil) n. Same as Saphism. [Provincial English.]

Sap-sucker (sa-pu'suk-er) n. The popular American name of several small woodpeckers, as Picus carolin., Picus villosus, and Picus pubescens. They are so called from a common though erroneous belief that they suck the sap of trees.

Sap-vase (sa-p'vase) n. A vessel that conveys sap.

Sarcocolla-nut (sar-ko-k'yo-nut) n. A Brazilian nut, the seed of the Longitarsis Olivaria. See LECTURA.

Sap-wed (sa-p'wed) n. See ALBUSTUM.

Sappyrus (sa-pi'-dō) n. A family of hymenopterous insects of the section Fasces, the species of which are chiefly distinguished by the feet, in both sexes, being slender, and little or not at all spinose. The genus Sappyrus is the type, the species of which are supposed to be parasitic upon some of the wild bees. S. gemellus and S. cinereus are British species.

Sargus (sah) n. See SARGUS.

Sarabaites (sar-a-ba-ites) n. One of a sort of oriental monks who ascended from ordinary monastic life, a monk with no settled monastery or superior.

Saraband, Sarabanda (sar-a-ban'da) n. (Fr. sarabande, Sp. sarabanda, from Per sarband, a lively tune.) A dance now in 3/4 time, said to be derived from the Saracens - 2 In music, a composition adapted to the dance. It is grave and expressive in character, written in 2/4 or 3/4 time, and consists of two parts. Handel and other masters frequently wrote tunes of this kind.

Saracen (sar'-sen) n. [L. Saracenus, from Gr. sarakēnēs, Ar. sarakīn (pl. of sarak), orientalis orientalis.] An Arabian or other Mohammedan of the early and pre-Islamic period, a propagator of Mohammedanism in countries lying to the west of Arabia. By medieval writers the term was variously employed to designate the Arabs generally, the Mohammedans of Syria and Palestine, or the Arab-Berber races of Northern Africa. At a later time it was also applied to any infidel nation against which crusades were preached, such as the Turks.

Saracenic (sar-a-sen-ic) n. Pertaining to the Saracens - Saracenic architecture. See MOORISH architecture under MOORISH.

Sarcocolla (sar-o-kol'-la) n. Same as Sarcocolla.

Sarcina, Sarcinae (sar'-sina, sar'-sina) n. A pericolla or horn. British.

Sarcocolla (sar-ko-k'la) n. In India myth. the name of the female energy or wife of Brahman, the first of the Hindu triad. She is the goddess of speech, music, art, and letters.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [L. sarcocolla; Gr. sarcocolla, a bitter liquor from sarcocolla, to say like dog, to speak bitterly, from sarc, meat, dog.] A bitter cutting expression, a satirical remark or expression, uttered with some degree of scorn or contempt, a bitter gift, a taunt.

I gave the sarcocolla to the doctors,
And we can readily refuse it here. Croquet.

SAR Latin, radical, irony, haunt, gibe.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. A Sarcocolla.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. A Sarcocolla.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. A Sarcocolla.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. A Sarcocolla.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. A Sarcocolla.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. A Sarcocolla.

limbus, sa, which appears to have come into use in the thirteenth century.

There are three that cannot bear the heat
Of August sun, and under sarcocolla rest.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. A coarse woollen cloth worn by the lower class of persons, and those who subsisted on charity, mentioned during the thirteenth century. Written also Sarc. British.

Sarcocolla, Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā, sar'-kollā) n. [L. sarcocolla] A genus of minute plants of low organization and doubtful nature, but generally believed to be fungi, commonly found in masses discharged by vomiting from stomachs affected with cancer and certain forms of dyspepsia. Sarcocolla are also found in the urine, in the fluid of the ventricles of the brain, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Sarcocolla (sar'-kollā) n. [Or sarc, carve, fish.] C. N. D. A weak organic base existing in the juice of mammalian flesh, isomeric with hypoxanthine. It is found in the flesh of oxen, horses, hares, &c.

Satire (sat'ir or sat'êr), n. [L. satira (short), or more correctly satura, a satire, from satura, a dish filled with various kinds of fruits, a medley, an olio, lit. a full dish, from satur, full (whence saturate).] 1. A poetical composition holding up vice or folly to reprobation, and as a distinctive species of literary production first employed by ancient Roman writers; an invective poem.— 2. Any literary production in which persons, manners, or actions are attacked or denounced with irony, sarcasm, or similar weapons; a trenchant or cutting exposure of men or manners; keenness and severity of remark; trenchant invective; as, to be much given to satire; to write a satire on modern society.

Satire has always shone among the rest, And is the boldest way, if not the best, To tell men freely of their foulest faults, To laugh at their vain deeds and vainer thoughts. Dryden.

Satire is a valuable element of history—in politics and ethics it is the most permanent protest of good against evil and of genius against stupidity. Lord Houghton.

2. Severe criticism or denunciation.

The owls, bats, and several other birds of night, were one day got together in a thick shade, where they abused their neighbours in a very sociable manner. Their satire at last fell upon the sun, whom they all agreed to be very troublesome, impertinent, and inquisitive. Addison.

SYN. Sarcasm, irony, ridicule, lampoon, pasquinade, burlesque, wit, humour.

Satirical (sa-tîr'îk, sa-tîr'îk-al), a. [L. satiricus, Fr. satirique. See SATIRE.] 1. Belonging to satire; conveying or containing satire; as, a satirical work. 'A satirical style.' Roscommon.

He gave the little wealth he had To build a house for fools and mad; To show by one satirical touch No nation wanted it so much. Swift.

2. Fond of indulging in satire; given to satire; severe in language.

The satirical rogue here says that old men have grey beads. Shak.

A satirical tailor, who lived at Rome, and whose name was Pasquin, amused himself with severe rallery, liberally bestowed on those who passed by his shop. I. D'Israeli.

SYN. Cutting, poignant, sarcastic, bitter, reproachful, abusive.

Satirically (sa-tîr'îk-al-î), adv. In a satirical manner; with sarcastic or witty invective. A paper of verses satirically written. Dryden.

Satiricalness (sa-tîr'îk-al-nes), n. Quality of being satirical. 'An ill-natured wit, biased to satiricalness.' Fuller.

Satirist (sat'ir-ist), n. One who satirizes; specifically, one who writes satire.

Wycherley, in his writings, is the sharpest satirist of his time. Granville.

Satirize (sat'ir-îz), v. t. pret. & pp. satirized; ppr. satirizing. [Fr. satiriser.] To assail with satire; to make the object of satire; to censure with keenness or sarcastic wit.

It is as hard to satirize well a man of distinguished vices, as to praise well a man of distinguished virtues. Swift.

Satisfaction (sat-is-fak'shon), n. [Fr. from L. satisfactio. See SATISFY.] 1. The act of satisfying, or state of being satisfied; gratification of appetite or desire; contentment in possession and enjoyment; repose of mind resulting from compliance with what it demands.

Run over the circle of the earthly pleasures, and had not God procured a man a solid pleasure from his own actions, he would be forced to complain that pleasure was not satisfaction. South.

2. Settlement of a claim due, a demand, &c.; payment; indemnification.

You know since Pontrecoet the sum is due. . . . Therefore make present satisfaction. Shak.

3. That which satisfies or gratifies; compensation; atonement; reparation.

Die he or justice must; unless for him Some other able, and as willing, pay The rigid satisfaction, death for death. Milton.

4. The opportunity of satisfying one's honour by a duel; a hostile meeting conceded on the challenge or cartel of an aggrieved party: used adjectively in extract.

A case of satisfaction pistols, with the satisfactory accompaniments of powder, ball, and caps, were hired from a manufacturer. Dickens.

—Contentment, Satisfaction. See under CONTENTMENT. —SYN. Contentment, content, gratification, pleasure, recompense, compensation, amends, remuneration, indemnification, atonement.

Satisfactive (sat-is-fak'tiv), a. Giving satisfaction. 'A final and satisfactive discernment of faith.' Sir T. Browne. [Rare.]

Satisfactorily (sat-is-fak'to-ri-î), adv. In a satisfactory manner; so as to give satisfaction, content, conviction, or the like. 'To answer him satisfactorily unto all his demands.' Sir K. Digby.

Satisfactoriness (sat-is-fak'to-ri-nes), n. The state or quality of being satisfactory; the power of satisfying or giving content; as, the satisfactoriness of pleasure or enjoyment.

The incompleteness of the seraphic lover's happiness in his fruitions, proceeds not from their want of satisfactoriness, but his want of an entire possession of them. Boyle.

Satisfactory (sat-is-fak'to-ri), a. [Fr. satisfactoire.] 1. Giving or producing satisfaction; yielding content; particularly, relieving the mind from doubt or uncertainty, and enabling it to rest with confidence; as, to give a satisfactory account of any remarkable transaction.— 2. Making amends, indemnification, or recompense; causing to cease from claims and to rest content; atoning.

A most wise and sufficient means of salvation by the satisfactory and meritorious death and obedience of the incarnate Son of God, Jesus Christ. Bp. Sanderson.

Satisfiable (sat-is-fî-a-bl), a. Capable of being satisfied.

Satisfier (sat'is-fi-er), n. A person or thing that gives satisfaction.

Satisfy (sat'is-fî), v. t. pret. & pp. satisfied; ppr. satisfying. [Fr. satisfaire; L. satisfacio —satis, enough, and facio, to make.] 1. To gratify fully the wants, wishes, or desires of; to supply to the full extent with what is wished for; to make content; as, to satisfy hunger or thirst; to satisfy a hungry man. 'Satisfy our eyes.' Shak.

The sports of children satisfy the child. Goldsmith.

2. To comply with the rightful demands of; to give what is due to; to answer or discharge, as a claim, debt, legal demand, or the like; to pay; to liquidate; to requite.

A grave question . . . arose, whether the money . . . should be paid directly to the discontented chiefs or should be employed to satisfy the claims which Argyle had against them. Macaulay.

3. To fulfil the conditions of; to answer; as, an algebraical equation is said to be satisfied when, after the substitution of any expressions for the unknown quantities which enter it, the two members are equal.— 4. To free from doubt, suspense, or uncertainty; to give full assurance to; to set at rest the mind of; to convince; as, to satisfy one's self by inquiry.

I will be satisfied; let me see the writing. Shak.

SYN. To content, please, gratify, satiate, sate, recompense, compensate, remunerate, indemnify.

Satisfy (sat'is-fî), v. i. 1. To give satisfaction or content; as, earthly good never satisfies. 2. To make payment; to atone.

Satisfying (sat'is-fîng), p. & a. Giving satisfaction or content; settling doubts at rest.

The standing evidences of the truth of the gospel are in themselves most firm, solid, and satisfying. Atterbury.

Satisfyingly (sat'is-fîng-î), adv. In a manner tending to satisfy.

Sative (sat'iv), a. [L. sativus, from sevo, sature, to sow.] Sown, as in a garden. 'Preferring the domestic or sative for the fuller growth.' Boslyn.

Satrap (sâ'trap), n. [Gr. satrapês; borrowed from the Persian.] 1. A governor of a province under the ancient Persian monarchy. 2. A prince; a petty despot. 'Obsequious tribes of satraps, princes.' Shenstone.

Satrapal (sâ'trap-al), a. Pertaining to a satrap or a satrapy.

Satrapess (sâ'trap-es), n. A female satrap.

Satrapical (sat-râp'îk-al), a. Satrapal.

Satrapy (sâ'trap-î), n. The government or jurisdiction of a satrap; a principality; a principedom.

The angels themselves are distinguished and questioned into their celestial principedoms and satrapies. Milton.

Saturable (sat'û-ra-bl), a. [See SATURATE.] Admitting of being saturated; capable of saturation.

Saturant (sat'û-rant), a. [L. saturans, saturans, ppr. of saturare. See SATURATE.] Saturating; impregnating to the full.

Saturate (sat'û-rant), n. In med. a substance which neutralizes the acid in the stomach.

Saturate (sat'û-rât), v. t. pret. & pp. saturated; ppr. saturating. [L. saturare, saturatus, from satur, filled (whence sature); from root of satis, enough, satis, to feed to the full. See SATIS.] 1. To cause to become completely saturated, impregnated, or soaked; to fill fully; to imbue thoroughly; to soak; as, to saturate a cloth with moisture; saturate with ancient learning. 'Adulteries that saturate soul with body.' Tennyson.

Innumerable flocks and herds covered that vast expanse of emerald meadow, saturated with the moisture of the Atlantic. Macaulay.

2. In chem. to impregnate or unite with till no more can be received; thus, an acid saturates an alkali, and an alkali saturates an acid, when the solvent can contain no more of the dissolving body.

Saturate (sat'û-rât), a. Being full; saturated. 'Though soaked and saturate, out and out.' Tennyson.

The lark is gay That dries its feathers, saturate with dew. Cropper.

Saturation (sat'û-râ'shon), n. The act of saturating or filling or supplying to fullness, or the state of being so saturated; complete penetration or impregnation; specifically, in chem. the union, combination, or impregnation of one body with another in such definite proportions as that they neutralize each other, or till the receiving body can contain no more; solution continued till the solvent can contain no more. The saturation of an alkali by an acid is by one sort of affinity; the saturation of water by salt is by another sort of affinity, called solution. A fluid which holds in solution as much of any substance as it can dissolve is said to be saturated with it, but saturation with one substance does not deprive the fluid of its power of acting on and dissolving some other bodies; and in many cases it increases this power. For example, water saturated with salt will dissolve sugar.

Saturday (sat'êr-dâ), n. [A. Sax. Saterdag, Saterdag—Sater, Saturn, for Saturn, and dag, a day—the day presided over by the planet Saturn; D. Zaterdag; L. dies Saturni.] The seventh or last day of the week; the day of the Jewish Sabbath.

Saturea (sat'û-rê'i-a), n. [L. savoria.] A genus of herbs and undershrubs commonly called Savory, and used in cookery as a seasoning, particularly the summer savory (S. hortensis), an annual plant cultivated in kitchen-gardens. The species are mostly natives of Europe, and belong to the nat. order Labiate. They have narrow, opposite, pale-green leaves, and small pale-lilac axillary flowers.

Saturity (sat'ûr-î-tî), n. [L. saturitas. See SATURATE.] Fullness or excess of supply; the state of being saturated; repletion.

In all things for man's use there is not only a mere necessity given of God, but also a satiety permitted; not saturity. Granger.

Saturn (sat'arn), n. [L. Saturnus, connected with sevo, sature, to sow.] 1. An ancient Italian deity, popularly believed to have made his first appearance in Italy in the reign of Janus, instructing the people in agriculture, gardening, &c., thus elevating them from barbarism to social order and civilization. He was consequently elected Sauria (saur'ia), a. pl. (From Gr. saurus, a lizard.) The term by which the great order of lizards is sometimes designated. The animal forms more strictly included under it are those comprised under the genus Lacerta of Linnaeus, but in the large and now generally received acceptation of the term saurians, not only the existing lizards, crocodiles, monitor, iguana, chameleon, &c., are included, but also those monstrous fossil reptiles whose remains excite our wonder, as the Ichthyosaurus, Plesiosaurus, Dinobirds, Trilobites, Stegosauria, Archosauria, &c. The saurians are covered with scales, and have four legs. The mouth is always armed with teeth, and the toes are generally furnished with claws. They have all a tail more or less long, and generally very thick at the base. The fossil species, the most gigantic and singular members of the order occur most abundantly in the coaliferous strata. Some of them were exclusively marine, others amphibious, others terrestrial, and others were adapted for flying, as the Pterodactylus.

Saurian (saur'ian), a. (Or saurus, a lizard.) Pertaining to the Sauria or lizards; designating an order of reptiles.

Saurian (saur'ian), n. One of the order Sauria, a lizard or lizard-like animal.

Saurillus (saur'illus), n. (Dim. of Gr. saurus, a lizard.) An extinct genus of reptiles belonging to the lizard order. Their fossil remains occur in upper coaliferous rocks.

Saurulus (saur'ulus), n. Saururus, luteus, Scutellaria (Scotch).

Saurorhachis (saur'or-hach'is), a. pl. (Or saurus, a lizard, and rhachis, a frog.) A name sometimes applied to the order of the tailed amphibians, otherwise called Urodela, and by Owen Ichthyosaurus. See URODELA.

Saurorhynchus (saur'or-rhynch'us), n. (Or saurus, a lizard, and rhynchus, a head.) A genus of fossil fishes of the cycloid order, found in the chalk formation.

Saurodon (saur'odon), n. (Or saurus, a lizard, and odon, a tooth.) A genus of fossil fishes from the chalk series of England and America.

Saurid (saur'id), n. Resembling lizards; an, saurid fish.

Saurid (saur'id), n. (Or saurus, a lizard, and oid, form.) A member of a group of large fishes, some existing and some fossil. The fossil saurids are found in great abundance in the carboniferous and secondary formations. They combined in their structure certain characters of reptiles, and had teeth resembling those of crocodiles. The Saurid (fish).

1. Pygosternus (modern). 2. Tooth of St. (modern). 3. Jaw with teeth of Saurorhynchus (modern). 4. Saurid of S. crassus (fossil).

existing saurid fishes consist of several species, the best known being the bony fishes and sturgeons constituting respectively the genera Lepidosteus and Acipenser. The members of another genus (Polysternus) inhabit the Nile, Senegal, and other African rivers, and are remarkable for the peculiar structure of the dorsal fin, which is broken up into a number of separate portions.

Saurorhynchus (saur'or-rhynch'us), n. The first-fruits of a Sauria. See CHIRIA.

Saurorhynchus (saur'or-rhynch'us), n. (Or saurus, a lizard, and rhynchus, a head.) A genus of birds belonging to the family of the butcherbirds.

Saurorhynchus (saur'or-rhynch'us), n. pl. (Or saurus, a lizard, rhynchus, a head, and rhynchus, a head.) Professor Huxley's name for the second of his three primary notions of vertebrates, comprising birds and reptiles. The animals of this section are characterized by the absence of gills, by having the skull joined to the vertebral column by a single cartilaginous condyle, the lower jaw composed of several pieces, and united to the skull by means of a special (quadrate) bone, and by possessing nucleated red blood corpuscles, as well as by certain embryonic characters.

Saurorhynchus (saur'or-rhynch'us), n. pl. (Or saurus, a lizard, and rhynchus, a head.) A wing, a fin. An extinct order of reptiles corresponding to Huxley's order Plesiosauria, and forming one of the thirteenth orders into which Owen arranges all the Reptiles. There are ten genera, extending through all the strata from the trias to the chalk inclusive. The genus Plesiosaurus may be regarded as the type. See Plesiosaurus.

Saururus (saur'urus), n. pl. (Or saurus, a lizard, and urus, a tail, in allusion to the appearance of the flower-spikes.) A natural order of plants belonging to the achlamydeous group of incomplete exogens. It consists of a few genera which are aquatic or marshy herbs or herbaceous plants, found in North America, China, the north of India, and the Cape of Good Hope. They are simple or little branched herbs, with alternate, stipulate, entire leaves, and small flowers in dense terminal spikes or racemes.

Saururus (saur'urus), n. pl. (Or saurus, a lizard, and urus, a tail.) An extinct order of birds, including only a single member, the Archaeopteryx maureri, of which only a single fragmentary specimen has been discovered in the upper colts (lithographic strata) of Solenhofen. It seems to have been as large as a rook. It differs from all known birds in having two free claws belonging to the wing, a lizard-like tail longer than the body (whence the name of the order), and no ploughshare bone. The metacarpal bones are not ankylosed as they are in all other known birds living and extinct.

Saururus (saur'urus), n. A fish of the genus Scomberus, family Scomberidae, and order Pharyngognathi, having a greatly elongated body covered with minute scales. The jaws are prolonged into a long sharp beak. One species (S. saurus), about 12 inches long, occurs plentifully on the British coast, frequenting firths in shoals so dense that it may be taken in pitfalls. In order to escape the pursuit of the porpoise and large fishes it often leaps out of the water or swims rapidly along the surface, whence it has obtained the name of skipper. The fish is palatable.

Sausage (saw'sij), n. (Old spellings sauzage, sauzage O Fr. sauzage, Fr. sauzage, from L.L. salsus, sauces (chopped see).) An article of food, consisting of chopped or minced meat, as pork, beef, or veal, seasoned with sage, pepper, salt, &c., and stuffed into properly cleaned entrails of the ox, sheep, or pig, tied at short intervals with a string. When sausages are made on an extensive scale the meat is minced and stuffed into the intestines by machinery.

Sausage-roll (saw'sij röl), n. Meat minced and seasoned as for sausages, enveloped in a roll of flour paste, and cooked.

Sausage-skin (saw'sij skyn), n. [L. salsus, salt, and phlogis, phlogis.] An eruption of red spots or scales on the face. Chloasma.

Sausage-skin (saw'sij skyn), n. Having red spots or scales on the face. Chloasma.

Sausage-skin (saw'sij skyn), n. (In honour of Horace Benjamin de Sausure, a Swiss naturalist.) A genus of plants, nat. order Compositae. S. alpina is a British species, which grows on moist alpine rocks, and is frequent on the Highland mountains of Scotland.

Sausage-skin (saw'sij skyn), n. A mineral so covered, or a found at the Impure Lab. in the Swiss.

Sausage-skin (saw'sij skyn), n. A musical instrument, a harp or lyre.

Sausage-skin (saw'sij skyn), n. (Fr. sauzage.) A species of lizard of the family Phrynosoma or Monitior. See MONITOR.

Slivio, finding his application unsuccessful, was resolved to make a saving bargain; and since he could not get the widow's estate, to recover what he had laid out of his own. Addison.

4. Reserving, as some title or right.

Ordinances may be cited of every reign from St. Louis to Francis I. regulating the jurisdiction of Seneschals and Balliis and giving them various powers, but always directing by saving clauses that the jurisdiction of the Barons who had right of Haut Justice should not be interfered with. Brougham.

Saving (sáv'ing), n. 1. Something kept from being expended or lost; something hoarded up; that which is saved; generally in plural. 'Hoard all savings to the uttermost.' Tennyson.—2. Exception; reservation.

Content not with those that are too strong for us, but still with a saving to honesty. Sir R. L'Estrange.

Saving (sáv'ing), prep. 1. With exception; in favour of; excepting.

Such laws could not be abrogated saving only by whom they were made. Hooker.

2. Without disrespect to. See under REVERENCE. 'Saving your reverence.' Shak. Savingly (sáv'ing-lí), adv. 1. In a saving manner; with frugality or parsimony.—2. So as to be finally saved from eternal death; as, savingly converted.

Savingsness (sáv'ing-nes), n. 1. The quality of being saving; frugality; parsimony; caution not to expend money without necessity or use.—2. Tendency to promote safety or eternal salvation. 'The safety and savingsness which it promisseth.' Brevint.

Savings-bank (sáv'ing-bangk), n. An institution devised for receiving and securely investing the savings of industry, and for their accumulation at compound interest, under provisions for their repayment on demand or at short notice, managed by persons having no interest in the profits of the business. The National Security Savings-banks and the Post-office Savings-banks are the two principal institutions of this kind. Acts for the regulation of the former were passed in 1817, empowering the managers to pay the deposits into the Bank of England to the credit-account of the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt, a fixed rate of interest being given thereupon. The national post-office savings-bank scheme came into operation in 1861. The old savings-banks and the post-office savings-banks have continued to work harmoniously together, and each system appears to offer special advantages on certain points. Penny savings-banks, military savings-banks, and savings-banks for seamen have been established as auxiliaries of the general system, for the purpose of meeting the special needs of classes for which the ordinary savings-banks did not hold out adequate inducements or facilities.

Saviour (sáv'yér), n. [O. Fr. sálveur (Mod. Fr. sauveur), from L. salvator, from L. salvus, safe.] 1. One who saves, preserves, or delivers from destruction or danger. 2 Kl. xiii. 6; la. xix. 20.—2. Jesus Christ, the Redeemer, who has opened the way to everlasting salvation by his obedience and death, and who is therefore called the Saviour by way of distinction.

Lightly from his grassy couch up rose
Our Saviour, and found all was but a dream. Milton.

Savouress (sáv'yér-es), n. A female saviour. [Rare.]

One says to the blessed Virgin, O Savouresse, save me. Sp. Hall.

Savonette (sav-o-net'), n. [Fr. dim. of savon, soap.] A wash-ball for use at the toilet, composed of soap of fine quality, perfumed at will, and generally with the addition of some powdered starch or farina, and sometimes sand.

Savor (sáv'or), n. Same as Savour.

Savourous, a. Savoury; sweet; pleasant. Romaunt of the Rose.

Savory (sáv'ér-i), n. [Fr. savorie, It. satoreja, L. satureia, savory.] A plant of the genus Satureia (which see).

Savour (sáv'ér), n. [O. Fr. savor, Mod. Fr. savor; L. sapor, from sapio, to taste.] 1. Smell; odour. 'I smell sweet savours.' Shak. 'A savour that may strike the dulllest nostril.' Shak. 'The uncleanly savours of a slaughter-house.' Shak.—2. Flavour; taste; relish; power or quality that affects the palate; as, food with a pleasant savour. 'If the salt hath lost his savour.' Mat. v. 13.

3. Characteristic property; distinctive flavour, quality, or the like. 'The savour of death from all things there that live.' Milton. 'The savour of heaven perpetually upon my spirit.' Baxter.—4. Character; reputation. Ex. v. 21.—5. Sense of smell: power to scent or perceive. [Rare.]—6. Pleasure; delight.

Savour (sáv'ér), s. t. 1. To have a particular smell or taste; to have a flavour.

What is loathsome to the young Savours well to thee and me. Tenneyson.

2. To be of a particular nature; to partake of the quality, nature, or appearance of something else; to smack; to betoken: followed by of; as, the answers savour of a humble spirit; or they savour of pride.

This savours not much of distraction. Shak.

I have rejected every thing that savours of party.

Savour (sáv'ér), s. t. 1. To like; to taste or smell with pleasure; to relish; to take pleasure in; to enjoy. 'Filth savour but themselves.' Shak.

Thou *savour*est not the things that be of God, but those that be of men. Mat. xvi. 23.

2. To perceive by the taste or smell; hence, to taste intellectually; to perceive; to discern; to note. 'Were it not that in your writings I savour a spirit so very distant from my disposition, &c.' Heylin.—3. To indicate the presence of; to have the flavour or quality of.

Withal barrenness,
That cuts us off from hope; and savours only Rancour and pride, impatience and despite. Milton.

Savourily (sáv'ér-i-lí), adv. 1. In a savoury manner; with a pleasing relish. 'When silly plays so savourily go down.' Dryden.—2. With gusto or appetite. 'The collation he fell to very savourily.' Sir R. L'Estrange.

Savouriness (sáv'ér-i-nes), n. The condition or quality of being savoury; pleasing taste or smell; as, the savouriness of a pineapple or a peach. 'The savouriness of meat.' Jer. Taylor.

Savourless (sáv'ér-less), a. Destitute of savour; insipid.

Savoury (sáv'ér-lí), a. Well-seasoned; of good taste; savoury.

Savourily (sáv'ér-lí), adv. With a pleasing relish. 'Then his food doth taste savourily.' Barrow.

Savourous (sáv'ér-us), a. Sweet; pleasant. Romaunt of the Rose.

Savoury (sáv'ér-i), a. Having savour or relish; pleasing to the organs of smell or taste, especially the latter; palatable; hence, agreeable in general; as, a savoury odour; savoury meat. Gen. xxvii. 4.

One of Cromwell's chief difficulties was to restrain his musketeers and dragoons from invading by main force the pulpits of ministers whose discourses, to use the language of that time, were not savoury. Macaulay.

Savoury (sáv'ér-i), n. Same as Savoury.

Savoy (sav'oi), n. A variety of the common cabbage (Brassica oleracea bullata major), much cultivated for winter use.

Savoyard (sav-vo'árd), n. A native or inhabitant of Savoy.

Saw (sə), pret. of saw.

Saw (sə), n. [A. Sax. sawe, a saw; common to the Teutonic languages: Dan. saw, Icel. ságr, D. zaag, G. säge.] A cutting instrument consisting of a blade, band, or disc of thin iron or steel, with a dented or toothed edge. Saws are employed to cut wood, stone, ivory, and other solid substances, and are either reciprocating or circular. The best saws are of tempered steel, ground bright, and smooth. They are of various forms and sizes, varying from the minute surgical or dental tool to the large instrument used in saw-mills, and may be divided into hand-tools and machine-tools. The hand tools used by carpenters and other artificers in wood are the most numerous. Among the most common straight saws in general use are the following:—The cross-cut saw, for cutting logs transversely, and wrought by two persons, one at each end. The pit-saw, a long blade of steel with large teeth and a transverse handle at each end; it is used in saw-pits for sawing logs into planks or scantlings, and is wrought by two persons. The frame-saw, consisting of a blade from 5 to 7 feet long, stretched tightly in a frame of wood. It is used in a similar manner to the pit-saw. The ripping-saw, half-ripper, hand-saw, and panel-saw are saws for the use of one person, the blades tapering in length from the handle. Tenon-saws, sash-saws, dove-tail saws, &c., are saw made of very thin blades of steel stiffened with stout pieces of brass, iron, or steel fixed on their back edges. They are used for forming the shoulders of beams, dove-tail joints, etc., and for many other purposes for which a hand saw cut is required. Compass and key-hole saws are long narrow saws, tapering from about 1 inch to $\frac{3}{4}$ inch in width, and used for making curved cuts. Small frame-saw and band-saw, in which very thin narrow blades are tightly stretched, are occasionally used for cutting both wood and metal. Machine saws are comprehended under three different classes—circular, reciprocating, and band-saw. The circular saw is a disc of steel with saw teeth on its periphery. It is made to revolve with great rapidity and force, while the log is pushed forward against it by means of a travelling platform. The reciprocating saw works like a two-handed hand-saw, but it is fixed and the wood carried forward against its teeth. The band-saw or rib-on-saw consists of a thin endless saw placed like a belt over two wheels, and strained on them. The ribbon passes down through a flat sawing table, upon which the material to be cut is laid. Saws for cutting stone are without teeth.

Saw (sə), n. [A. Sax. saga, a saying, a saw, from root of to say. See SAY.] 1. A saying; proverb; maxim. Full of wise saws. Shak. No mabath-drawer of old saws. Templeton.—2. A device. Spenser.—Aphorism, Asium, Maxim, Aphorism, Axiom, Proverb, Byword, Saw. See under APOPHORISM.

Saw (sə), v. t. & v. i. pret. sowed, pp. sown. [From the noun.] 1. To cut with a saw; to separate with a saw; as, to saw timber or marble.—2. To form by cutting with a saw; as, to saw boards or planks; that is, to saw timber into boards or planks.—3. To move through, as in the act of sawing.

Do not saw the air too much with your head, that is, be not all giddy. Shak.

Saw (sə), v. i. 1. To use a saw; to practice sawing; as, a man saws well.—2. To cut with a saw; as, the mill saws fast or well.—3. To be cut with a saw; as, the timber saws smoothly.

Saw (sə), n. Salva (Scotch.) Sawarra-nut (sə-wā'rā-nut), n. Same as Sawara.

Sawder (sə'dər), n. [Corrupted from Solder] Flattery; blarney. (Slang) See under SOTT. Saw-dust (sə'dust), n. Dust or small fragments of wood, stone, or other material, produced by the attrition of a saw.

Sawyer (sə'yer), n. One that saws; a Sawyer. Saw-box (sə'boкс), n. A box of saws. 'A saw-box for a wounded conscience.' Cowley.

Saw-file (sə'fil), n. A file adapted for sharpening saws. It is triangular in section for hand-saws, and flat for mill-saws. E. H. Knight.

Saw-fish (sə'fish), n. An elasmobranchiate fish of the genus Pristis (P. serratorum), nearly related on the one hand to the sharks, and on the other to the rays. It attains a length of from 12 to 15 feet, has a long back edge the stems and leaves of plants, and deposit their eggs in the slots thus formed. The turnip-fly (Athalia crucifolia) and the gooseberry-fly (Homatus grossulariae) are examples.

Saw-frame (sə'frām), n. The frame in which a saw is set. See SAW-SHED.

Saw-gate (sə'gāt), n. The rectangular frame in which a mill-saw or gang of mill-saws is stretched, a saw rack.

Saw-gin (sə'jin), n. A machine used to direct motion of its bark and other superfluous parts. See CORTEX-GR.

Saw-mandrel (sə'mandrē), n. A contrivance for holding a saw in a lathe.

Saw-mill (sə'mil), n. A mill for sawing timber, and driven by water or steam. The saws used are of two distinct kinds, the circular and the reciprocating. See under SAW.

Sawn (sə), *pp. of saw. Sawney, Sawny (sə'ni), n. A nickname for a Scotchman, from Sandy, a corruption of Alexander.*

Saw-pit (sə'pit), n. A pit over which timber is sawed by two men, one standing below the timber and the other above.

Saw-sash (sə'sash), n. Same as Saw-pit.

Saw-set (sə'set), n. An instrument used to wrest or turn the teeth of saws alternately to the right and left so that they may make a kerf somewhat wider than the thickness of the blade. Called also Saw-crest.

Saw-toothed (sə'toıht), a. Having teeth like a saw; serrated.

Sawtry (sə'tri), n. A partery. Dryden.

Saw-whet, Saw-whetter (sə'whet, sə'whet-er), n. In the United States, the popular name for the Andean owl (Strix andina) of Audubon.

Saw-wort (sə'wert), n. Serratula, a genus of plants of the nat. order Compositae. It is so named from its serrated leaves. Common saw-wort (S. tinctoria) is a tall perennial plant with heads of purple flowers indigenous to England, growing in woods and in pasture grounds. It is used for dyeing cloth yellow, and is considered useful against piles.

Saw-wrest (sə'west), n. Same as Saw-set.

Sawyer (sə'yer), n. [In regard to the form of this word comp. Sawyer, Sawyer.] 1. One whose occupation is to saw timber into planks or boards, or to saw wood for fuel. 2. In the United States, a tree which, being undermined by a current of water, and falling into the stream, is swept along with its branches above water, which are continually raised and depressed by the force of the current, from which circumstance the name is derived. The sawyers in the Missouri and Mississippi render the navigation dangerous, and frequently sink boats which run against them.

Sax (saks), n. [A. Sax. sax.] A knife; a sword; a dagger.

Saxatile (saks'at-il), a. [L. saxatilis, from saxum, a rock.] Pertaining to rocks; living among rocks.

Sax-horn (saks'horn), n. [After M. Sax, of Paris, the inventor.] One of several brass wind-instruments with a wide mouthpiece and three, four, or five cylinders, much employed in military bands. The tone is round, pure, and full. These horns comprise the very high small sax-horn, the soprano, the alto, the tenor, baritone, bass, and double bass. Called also Sax-organ.

Saxicava (saks-i-kā'va), n. [L. saxum, a rock, and cava, to hollow out, to excavate.] A genus of lamellibranchiate molluscs, usually Saxicavidae or Gastrochaenidae, often found in the hollows of rocks, in cavities on the back of oysters, and among the roots of sea-weed, &c. On different parts of the coast of England masses of rock are found pierced with innumerable small holes, which form the entrances to the habitations of these animals.

Saxionidae (saks-i-kī'vī-dē), n. pl. A family of perforating bivalve molluscs, named from the genus Saxionea.

Saxionvora (saks-i-kā'vra), a. [L. saxum, a rock, and vora, to hollow out.] In need a term applied to animals which make holes in the rocks, either by boring them or by dissolving the rock by means of some acid which they secrete.

Saxicola (saks-i-kī'ō-la), n. A genus of birds; the chats.

Saxicolous (saks-i-kī'ō-lus), a. In habit growing on rocks.

Saxifraga (saks-i-frā-ga), n. A genus of plants, the type of the nat. order Saxifragaceae. See SAXIFRAGE.

Saxifragaceae (saks-i-frā-gā'sē-sē), n. pl. A nat. order of plants, belonging to the apocarpous group of polypetalous exogama. It consists of shrubs and herbaceous plants, with simple alternate leaves, without stipules, regular, often handsome flowers with perigynous or epigynous petals, definite stamens, free or connate carpels, and albuminous seeds. The species inhabit the mountainous districts of Europe and the northern parts of the world; the whole order is more or less astringent. The root of Hebeche americana is a powerful astringent, and called in North America stem-root.

Saxifragaceae (saks-i-frā-gā'sē-sē), a. Belonging to the Saxifragaceae.

Saxifragant (saks-i-frā-gant), a. Breaking or destroying stones; saxifragous; litho-eretic. [Rare.]

Saxifragant (saks-i-frā-gant), a. That which breaks or destroys stones. [Rare.]

Saxifrage (saks-i-frā), n. [L. saxum, a stone, and frago, to break.] The name was originally given to a plant supposed to be beneficial in removing stone in the bladder, but the saxifrages seem to have got the name rather from growing among rocks. A popular name of various plants, the saxifrages proper belonging to the Chinese Saxifrage (Saxifraga sarmentosa), genus Saxifraga of the nat. order Saxifragaceae. The species are mostly inhabitants of alpine and subalpine regions of the colder and temperate parts of the northern zone. Most of them are true rock plants, with tufted foliage and panicles of white, yellow, or red flowers; and many are well known as ornamental plants in our gardens, as S. umbrosa, London pride or stone-cress, S. granulata, white or granulated meadow saxifrage, S. hypnoides, mossy saxifrage or ladies' cushion; S. granulata, or thick-leaved saxifrage; S. sarmentosa, or Chinese saxifrage, which as shown in the cut puts out ornamental sarments (str.). The genus is a large one, containing upwards of 150 species, of which at least twelve are natives of Britain. The burnet saxifrage is Pimpinella Saxifraga; the golden saxifrage is the genus Chrysosplenium; the pepper or meadow saxifrage is Silene pratensis.

Saxifragous (saks-i-frā-gus), a. Same as Saxifragant. [Rare.]

Saxon (saks'on), n. [L. Saxo, pl. Saxones, A. Sax. Saxones, pl. Saxones, Saxones, usually derived from sax, O. H. G. saks, a short sword, a dagger; O. Saksas, a Saxon.] 1. One of the nation or people who formerly dwelt in the northern part of Germany, and who invaded and conquered England in the fifth and sixth centuries; one of their descendants; an Anglo-Saxon; one of English race.—2. The language of the Saxons, Anglo-Saxon. The terms Saxon and Anglo-Saxon are popularly used to designate that early form of the English language which prevailed to the close of the twelfth century. See ANGLO-SAXON.—Old Saxon, Saxon as spoken on the Continent in early times in the district between the Rhine and the Elbe.—3. A native or inhabitant of modern Saxony.

SAXON (sæk'son), s. 1. Pertaining to the Saxons, to their country, or to their language. Anglo-Saxon.—2. Of or pertaining to modern Saxony or its inhabitants.—Saxon architecture, the earliest stage of native English architecture, its period being from the conversion of England till the Conquest or near it, when Norman architecture began Saxon Architecture.

a. Tower of Scarning Church, Essex. b. Tower of Barton-on-Humber Church, Lincolnshire. c. Long and short work. d. Window with a baluster.

to prevail. The few rules left us of this style exhibit its general characteristics as having been rude solidity and strength. The walls are of rough masonry, very thick, without buttresses, and sometimes of herring-bone work, the towers and pillars thick in proportion to height, the former being sometimes not more than three diameters high, the quoins or angle masonry are of brown stones set alternately on end and horizontally, the arches of doorways and windows are rounded, or sometimes these openings have triangular heads, their jambs of long and short work carrying either rudely carved impostes or capitals with square abaci. Sometimes heavy mouldings run round the arches, and when two or more arches are conjoined in an arcade these are on heavy low shafts formed like balusters. Window openings in the walls splay from both the interior and the exterior, the position of the windows being in the middle of the thickness of the wall.

SAXON-BLUE (sæk'son-blū), n. A solution of indigo in concentrated sulphuric acid. It is much used as a dye-stuff.

SAXONDOM (sæk'son-dəm), n. Countries inhabited by Saxons, peoples or population of English or Anglo-Saxon origin.

Look now at American Saxonism, and at this little fact of the sailing of the Mayflower two hundred years ago, from Deth Haven in Holland.

SAXON-GREEN (sæk'son-grīn), n. A colour produced by dyeing yellow upon a Saxon-blue ground.

SAXONISM (sæk'son-iz-əm), n. An idiom of the Saxon or early English language.

The language is full of Saxonisms, which abound more or less in every writer before George and Chaucer.

SAXONIST (sæk'son-ist), n. One versed in the Saxon language.

SAXOPHONE (sæk'so-fōn), n. One of a family of brass wind-instruments invented by M. Sax, their tones are soft and penetrating in the higher part, expressive in the middle, and full and rich in the lower part of their compass. The saxophones are six in number, the high, the soprano, the alto, the tenor, the baritone, and the bass. They are played with a single reed, and a clarinet mouthpiece.

SAXOTROMBA (sæk'so-trom-ba), n. One of a class of brass instruments introduced by M. Sax, with a wide mouthpiece and three or four cylinders. The tone partakes of the quality both of the trumpet and the bagpipe. The complete set is six in number: the high, soprano, alto, tenor, baritone, and bass.

SAX-TUBE (sæk'stū-ba), n. A brass instrument introduced by M. Sax, with wide mouthpiece and three cylinders. The tone is very sonorous.

SAY (sā), v.t. pret. & pp. said, contr. from sayed; ppr. saying. [O.E. sagan, sagan, sagan, A. Sax. sagan, to say—a word common to all the Teutonic tongues, except that it is not known as Gothic, Icel. saga, D. zeggen, G. sagen.] 1. To utter, express, declare, or pronounce in words, either orally or in writing, to speak, as, he said nothing, he said many things, he says not a word; say a good word for me.

He never says a foolish thing.
Nor ever does a wise one.
I wene I know not what
Yet something I did wish to say.

2. To argue; to allege by way of argument. 'After all can be said against a thing.' Filolous.—3. To repeat, to rehearse; to recite, as, to say a lesson, to say one's prayers, to say grace.

She used every day to wend
'Twas her affairs, her spoils and charms to say.

4. To pronounce, to recite without singing. 'Then shall be said or sung as follows.' Common Prayer. 5. To answer; to utter by way of reply; to tell. 'Say in brief the cause.' Shak. 6. To suppose, to assume to be true, to presume; to take for granted; in this sense often in the imperative. 'Troops left in Balacava, say 2000.' Sir J. M. Alder. 'Well, say there is no kingdom then for Richard? What other pleasure can the world afford?' Shak.

7. To utter as an opinion; to announce as a decision; to decide; to judge.

But what is it, hard to say,
Harder to hit.

—It says, an impersonal usage sometimes met with—it is said.

It says in the New Testament that the dead came out of their graves.

—It is said, they say, it is commonly reported, people assert or maintain.—To say nay, to refuse. 'As who shall say me nay.' Tennyson.

If you please so well for them
As I can say nay to them for myself,
He doubt not bring it to a happy issue.

—To say so, to think of; to judge of; to be of opinion regarding.

What say you to a letter from your friends? Shak.

—That is to say, that is; to other words, otherwise. In legal and mercantile usage, often contracted to say; as, a sum of £200 (say, five hundred pounds).—Say, Speak, v.t. Although this word is nearly synonymous with say, and in some usages with tell, yet generally the applications of these words are different. Thus we say to speak an oration, to tell a story; but in these phrases say cannot be used. Yet to say a lesson is good English, and so in say prayers. We never use the phrases to say a sermon or discourse, to say an argument, to say a speech, to say testimony. A very general use of say is to introduce a relation, narration, or recital, either of the speaker himself or of something said or done, or to be done by another. Thus, Adam said, This is bone of my bone; Noah said, Blessed be the Lord God of Shem; If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, say to the cities of Judah, Behold your God. I cannot say what I should do in a similar case.

SAY (sā), v.t. 1. To speak; to declare; to assert; to express an opinion; as, so he says. 2. To make answer; to reply.

To this argument we shall soon have said; for what concerns it us to have a husband dividing his household property?

SAY (sā), n. 1. What one has to say, a speech, a story, something said, hence, an affirmation, a declaration, a statement. 'Let me say my say.' Tennyson.

The Archbishop said out his say, standing with his back to the empty fireplace.

2. A maxim, a saying; a saw. 'That strange palmer's boding say.' Sir W. Scott. The spelling Says is also found.

He took it on the page's eye,
Mumblin' had driven those stands away.

SAYI (sā), n. [For say.] 1. A saw, trial by simple; example; taste. 'To take a say of venison, or stags level by your own.' J. Jonson.

Thy tongue some say of breeding breatheth.

2. Tried quality; temper; proof. 'A sword of better say.' Spenser.—To give the say, to assure the goodness of the witness and dishes, a duty formerly performed at court by the royal taster.—To give a say out, to make an attempt for.

And give a say, I will not say directly,
But very fair of the philosopher's stone.

SAYI (sā), v.t. To say; to try. 'Of all say's yet I wish thee happiness.' Shak. 'The tailor brings a suit home; he it says.' J. Jonson.

SAYI (sā), For Say, pret. of say (see). Shak.

SAYI (sā), n. [Fr. saie, It. saia, from L. saia = serum, a coarse woolen mantle or blanket.] 1. A delicate kind of serge or woolen cloth. Halliwell.—2. A species of silk or satin. 'A kirtle of discoloured say.' Spenser. 'Thou say, thou serge, may thou buckram lord.' Shak.

SAYER (sā'er), n. One who says.

Mr. Curran was something much better than a sayer of smart sayings.

SAYETTE (sā-et'), n. Same as Sagittary. SAYING (sā'ing), n. 1. That which is said, an expression; a sentence uttered; a declaration. 'Moses said at this saying.' Acts vii. 35.

The sacred function can never be hurt by those sayings, if not first repurchased by our doing.

2. A proverbial expression; a maxim; an adage. 'Blush like a black dog, as the saying is.' Shak.

Many are the sayings of the wise.

Running parlance or the wisest homeliness.

SAYMASTER (sā'māst), n. Same as Saymaster.

SAYMASTER (sā'māst), n. [Abbrev. of say-master.] One who makes trial or proof, an assay master. 'Grant saymaster of state.' J. Jonson.

SAYED (sā'id), inter. An impression abbreviated from God's blood.

'Saided, I am an anarchy as a gift or a beggar bear.

SCAB (shāb), n. [A. Sax. scab, from L. scabies, scab, acur, itch, from scab, to scratch, akin to Gr. skabō to dig.] 1. An incrustated substance, dry and rough, formed over a sore in healing.—2. The mange in horses, a disease of sheep.—3. The itch. [Scotch].—4. A mean, dirty, paltry fellow. Applied to persons as a term of supreme contempt and disregard. 'A scab of a currier.' Sir R. L. Estlin.

SCABBARD (shāb'ard), n. [Old spellings scabert, scabert, scabert, scabert; of doubtful origin; the latter position is no doubt from A. Sax. scabard, O.E.G. scabard, to protect (comp. scabert), the first position being probably equivalent to scab, harm, injury, the scabbard being what prevents the weapon from doing harm when used in use. The sheath of a sword or other similar weapon. 'Knapier, scabbard and all.' Shak.

SCABBARD (shāb'ard), v.t. To put in a scabbard or sheath.

SCABBARD-FISH (shāb'ard-fish), n. The Lepidosteus osseus, a beautiful fish found in the Mediterranean and Eastern Atlantic, so called because in shape it bears some resemblance to the sheath of a sword. It is of a bright silvery whiteness, with a single dorsal fin running along the back. Saxon Architecture.

a, Tower of Scarning Church, Essex. b, Tower of Burton-on-Humber Church, Lincolnshire. c, Long and short work. d, Window with a baluster.

to prevail. The few relics left us of this style exhibit its general characteristics as having been rude solidity and strength. The walls are of rough masonry, very thick, without buttresses, and sometimes of herring-bone work, the towers and pillars thick in proportion to height, the former being sometimes not more than three diameters high; the quoins or angle masonry are of brown stones set alternately on end and horizontally, the arches of doorways and windows are rounded, or sometimes these openings have triangular heads, their jambs of long and short work carrying either rudely carved impostes or capitals with square abutments. Sometimes heavy mouldings run round the arches, and when two or more arches are enclosed in an arcade these are on heavy low shafts formed like balusters. Window openings in the walls splay from both the interior and the exterior, the position of the windows being in the middle of the thickness of the wall.

The language is full of Saxonisms, which abound more or less in every writer from Gower and Chaucer.

Saxonist (sax'on-ist), n. One versed in the Saxon language.

Saxophone (sax'o-fon), n. One of a family of brass wind-instruments invented by M. Sax; their tones are soft and penetrating in the higher part, expressive in the middle, and full and rich in the lower part of their compass. The saxophones are six in number: the high, the soprano, the alto, the tenor, the baritone, and the bass. They are played with a single reed, and a clarinet mouthpiece.

Saxotromba (sax'o-trom-ba), n. One of a class of brass instruments introduced by M. Sax, with a wide mouthpiece and three or four cylinders. The tone partakes of the quality both of the trumpet and the bugle. The complete set is six in number: the high, soprano, alto, tenor, baritone, and bass. Sax-tuba (sax'tü-ba), n. A brass instrument introduced by M. Sax, with wide mouthpiece and three cylinders. The tone is very sonorous.

Say (sä), v.t. pret. & pp. said, cont. from sayed, ppr. saying. [O.E. sagan, sagan, sagen, A. Sax. sagjan, to say—a word common to all the Teutonic tongues, except that it is not known as Gothic, Iscl. sagja, D. sagen, G. sagen.] 1. To utter, express, declare, or pronounce in words, either orally or in writing; to speak, as, he said nothing; he said many things, he says not a word; say a good word for me.

He never says a foolish thing.
Nor ever does a wise one.

I wrote I know not what.
Yet something I did wish to say.

2. To argue, to allege by way of argument. 'After all can be said against a thing.' Fullerton. — 3. To repeat; to rehearse, to recite, as, to say a lesson, to say one's prayers, to say grace.

She said every day to wend
'Twas her affairs, her spirits and charms to say.

4. To pronounce; to recite without singing. 'Thou shalt be said or sung as follows.' Common Prayer. — 5. To answer, to utter by way of reply; to tell. 'Say in brief the cause.' Shak. — 6. To suppose, to assume to be true; to presume; to take for granted; in this sense often in the imperative. 'Troops left in Balaclava, say 3000.' Sir J. M. Aldrich. Well, say there is no kingdom then for Richard; What other pleasure can the world afford? Shak. 7. To utter as an opinion; to announce as a decision, to decide, to judge.

Not what I think, hard is to say,
Harder to hit.

—It says, an impersonal usage sometimes met with—it is said.

It says in the New Testament that the dead came out of their graves.

—It is said, they say, it is commonly reported, people assert or maintain. — To say nay, to refuse. 'As who shall say me nay.' Tennyson.

If you please as well for them
As I can say nay to them for myself,
No doubt we'll bring it to a happy issue.

—To say in, to think of; to judge of; to be of opinion regarding.

What say you to a letter from your friends? Shak.

—That is to say, that is, in other words; otherwise: in legal and mercantile usage, often contracted to say, as, a sum of $500 (say, five hundred pounds). — Say, speak, tell. Although this word is nearly synonymous with speak, and in some cases with tell, yet generally the applications of these words are different. Thus we say to speak an oration, to tell a story, but in these phrases say cannot be used. Yet to say a lesson is good English, and so is to say a sermon. We never use the phrase to say a sermon or discourse, to say an argument, to say a speech, to say testimony. A very general use of say is to introduce a relation, narration, or recital, either of the speaker himself or of something said or done, or to be done by another. Thus, Adam said, This is bone of my bone; Noah said, Blessed be the Lord God of Shem; if we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, say to the cities of Judah, Behold your God, I cannot say what I should do in a similar case.

Say (sä), v.t. 1. To speak; to declare; to assert, to express an opinion, as, so he says. 2. To make answer; to reply.

To this argument we shall soon have said; for what concerns it to us to hear a husband divulging his household privacies?

Say (sä), n. 1. What one has to say; a speech, a story, something said; hence, an assertion, a declaration, a statement. 'Let me say my say.' Tennyson.

The Archdeacon said out his say, standing with his back to the empty fireplace.

2. A maxim, a saying; a saw. 'That strange palmer's boding say.' Sir W. Scott. The spelling Sage is also found.

He took it on the page's eye,
Hemlock had driven these words away.

Say (sä), n. [For say.] 1. A my, trial by sample; sample; taste. 'To take a say of venison, or stale fowl by your nose.' R. Jonson.

Thy tongue was a say of breeding toothmen.

2. Trial quality; temper; proof. 'A sword of better say.' Spenser. — To give the say, to assure the goodness of the witness and dishes, a duty formerly performed at courts by the royal taster. — To give a say etc., to make an attempt for.

And give a say, I will not say directly,
But very like of the philosopher's stone.

Say (sä), v.t. To say; to try. 'Of all say's yet I wish thee happiness.' Shak. The tailor brings a suit home; he it says. R. Jonson.

Say (sä), For Say, pret. of as (say). Saw Chaucer.

Say, Sayer (sä), n. [Fr. saye, It. saye, from l. saye = sayen, a coarse woolen mantle or blanket.] 1. A delicate kind of serge or woolen cloth. Halliwell. — 2. A species of silk or satin. 'A kirtle of discoloured say.' Spenser. 'Thou say, thou serge, say thou becom lord.' Shak.

Sayette (sä-et'), n. Same as Sayerette.

Saying (sä'ing), n. 1. That which is said, an expression; a declaration; a declaration. 'Moses fled at this saying.' Acts vii. 35.

The sacred function can never be lost by their sayings, if not first reproached by our own ears.

2. A proverbial expression; a maxim; an adage. 'Blush like a black dog, as the saying is.' Shak.

Many are the sayings of the wise,
Holding promise or the worst fortune.

Sayman (sä'man), n. Same as Saymaster.

Saymaster (sä'mas-ter), n. [Abbr. of assay-master.] One who makes trial or proof, an assay master. 'Great saymaster of state.' R. Jonson.

Sblood (sblöd), inter. An imprecation abbreviated from God's blood.

'Sblood, I am as melancholy as a gib-cat or a lugged bear.

Scab (skab), n. [A. Sax. scab, from L. scabber, scab, scuti, from scab, to scratch, akin to Gr. skapein, to dig.] 1. An increased substance, dry and rough, formed over a sore in healing. — 2. The mange in horses; a disease of sheep. — 3. The itch. [Scotch.] — 4. A mean, dirty, paltry fellow. Applied to persons as a term of supreme contempt and disregard. 'A scab of a currier.' Sir R. L. Estrange.

Scabbard (skab'ärd), n. [Old spellings scabbert, scabbert, scabber, scabbard; of doubtful origin, the latter portion is no doubt from A. Sax. scargan, O.E.G. scargan, to protect (comp. scabbert), the first portion being probably equivalent to scath, harm, injury, the scabbard being what prevents the weapon from doing harm when not in use.] The sheath of a sword or other similar weapon. 'Raptur, scabbard and all.' Shak.

Scabbard (skab'ärd), v.t. To put in a scabbard or sheath.

Scarlatina (skär-la-tä'na), n. [From scarlet.] A term frequently used to designate that febrile malady commonly called in English Scarlet Fever. It is characterized by fever, attended about the third day with an eruption of level or nearly level crimson red patches, first appearing in the fauces and on the face, neck, and breasts, and progressively on the whole surface, often confluent and terminating about the seventh day in cuticular exfoliations. There are two great varieties, S. simplex, in which the fever is moderate and terminates with the efflorescence, the prostration of strength being trifling, and the contagious power slight; and S. anginosa, in which the fever is severe, the throat ulcerated, and the disease highly contagious. S. maligna has been reckoned a variety of this in its worst degree. Scarlatina seizes persons of all ages, but children and young persons are most subject to it.

Scarlatinous (skär-la-ti'nus), a. Pertaining to scarlatina or scarlet fever. Dunglison.

Scarlet (skär'let), a. Free from scars. Scarless (skär'les), a. Free from scars. Fr. scarlate, It. scarlato; generally referred to Ar. or Per. eskarlät, eskarlät, but the eastern forms are as likely to be derived from the European as the latter from them. Another suggestion is L. galaticus, galaticus ruber (Galatian red) having been employed to signify scarlet, from cochineal being received from Galatia. The absence of a form intermediate between galaticus and scarlet militates against this supposition. Wedgwood suggests a derivation from the L. caro, carnis, flesh, the It. scarlatino, flesh-coloured, becoming Venetian scarlatino, mixed white and red.] 1. A beautiful bright red colour, brighter than crimson. The finest scarlet dye is obtained from cochineal.—2. Cloth of a scarlet colour; scarlet robe or dress.

All her household are clothed with scarlet.
Prov. xxxi. 21.

The only species known is found in Siberia, Greece, the whole of the continent of Europe to the south, and the Mediterranean coasts of Africa. It haunts thick herbage and grassy places.

Schema (skē'ma), n. 1. In the system of Kant, an object which exists in the understanding independently of matter; a synonym of form.

The schema is, in itself, always a mere product of the imagination. But as the synthesis of imagination has for its aim no single intuition, but merely unity in the determination of sensibility, the schema is clearly distinguishable from the image. Thus, if I place five points one after another . . . this is an image of the number five. On the other hand, if I only think a number in general, which may be either five or a hundred, this thought is rather the representation of a method of representing in an image a sum (e.g., a thousand) in conformity with a conception, than the image itself, an image which I should find difficulty in rendering perceptible to sight, and comparing with the conception. Now this representation of a general procedure of the imagination to present its image to a conception, I call the schema of the conception. Translation of Kant.

2. In the system of Leibnitz, the principle which is essential to each monad, and which constitutes the characteristics proper to each of them.

Schematic (skē-mat'ik), a. Pertaining to a scheme or schema.

They have been compelled to violate them in different ways, in their various and contradictory attempts to reduce these four moods to their schematic properties. Sir W. Hamilton.

Schematism (skē'mat-izm), n. [Gr. schēmatismos, from schēma. See SCHEME.] 1. In astrology, the combination of the aspects of heavenly bodies.—2. Particular form or disposition of a thing; an exhibition in outline of any systematic arrangements; outline; figure. [Rare.]

Every particle of matter, whatever form or schematism it puts on, must in all conditions be equally extended, and therefore take up the same room. Cranck.

Schema (skē'ma), n. 1. In the system of Kant, an object which exists in the understanding independently of matter; a synonym of form.

The schema is, in itself, always a mere product of the imagination. But as the synthesis of imagination has for its aim no single intuition, but merely unity in the determination of sensibility, the schema is clearly distinguishable from the image. Thus, if I place five points one after another . . . this is an image of the number five. On the other hand, if I only think a number in general, which may be either five or a hundred, this thought is rather the representation of a method representing in an image a sum (e.g. a thousand) in conformity with a conception, than the image itself, an image which I should find difficulty in rendering perceptible to sight, and comparing with the conception. Now this representation of a general procedure of the imagination to present its image to a conception, I call the schema of the conception. Translation of Kant.

2. In the system of Leibnitz, the principle which is essential to each monad, and which constitutes the characteristics proper to each of them.

Scherzando (skert-sān'dō), adv. [It.] In music, in a playful or sportive manner.

Scherzo (skert'sō), n. [It.] A term generally applied to a passage of a sportive character in musical pieces of some length, as in symphonies, quartettes, &c.

Schesis (skē'sis), n. [Gr. schesis, from schēin, to hold. See SCHERKE.] 1.† General state or disposition of the body or mind, or of one thing with regard to other things; habitude.—2. In rhet. a statement of what is considered to be the adversary's habitude of mind, by way of argument against him.

Schetich,† Schetichal† (sket'ik, sket'ik-al), a. [See SCHISTIS.] Pertaining to the state of the body; constitutional; habitual.

Scheuchzeria (shūk-wēr'i-a), n. In honour of John and James Scheuchzer, German botanists. A small marsh herb, nat. order Juncaginaceae, of wide distribution, with a creeping rootstock, erect slender leaves, and a leafy scape with racemose small yellowish six-partite flowers. S. palustris grows in wet spongy mountain bogs in some parts of Britain.

Schiedam (skē-dam'), n. A name for Holland gin, from Schiedam, in Holland, which is the chief seat of the manufacture. 'Smuggled schiedam.' Jerrold.

Schiller-spar (shil'ēr-spār), n. [G. schillern, to change colour, and ē. spar.] A genus of massive magnesio-siliceous spars, comprising four varieties, namely, common schiller-spar, bronzite, hypersthene, and anthophyllite. It is of a pearly lustre and changeable hue.

Schilling (shil'ing), n. Same as Skilling (which see).

Schinus (ski'nus), n. [From Gr. schinos, the name of the mastic. A resinous juice exudes from this tree similar to mastic.] A genus of trees and shrubs, nat. order Anacardiaceae, natives of tropical America. They have small white flowers in terminal axillary panicles, and unequally pinnate leaves with a very long terminal leaflet. The leaves of some species are so filled with a resinous fluid that the least degree of unusual repletion of the tissue causes it to be discharged; thus some of them fill the air with fragrance after rain.

Schiremant (shir'mant), n. A sheriff.

Schirrus (ski'r'rus). See SCHIRRHUS.

Schism (skizm), n. [L. schisma; from Gr. schisma, from schizo, to divide; akin to L. scindo, and to A. Sax. scēadan, G. scheiden, to separate, to part.] A split or division in a community; specifically and commonly, a division or separation in a church or denomination of Christians, occasioned by diversity of opinions; breach of unity among people of the same religious faith; the offence or sin of seeking to produce division in a church without just cause; as, to be guilty of schism. 'Schisms that were among our clergy.' Tyndall.

Schism is a rent or division in the church when it comes to the separating of congregations. Milten.

Schisma (aki'r'ma), n. [Gr. See SCHISM.] In music, an interval equal to half a comma. See COMMA, 3.

Schismatic, Schismatical (siz-mat'ik, siz-mat'ik-al), a. Pertaining to schism; implying schism; partaking of the nature of schism; tending to schism; as, schismatical opinions or proposals.

How much soever a schismatical or heretical spirit, in the apostolic sense of the terms, may have contributed to the formation of the different sects into which the Christian world is at present divided, no person who, in the spirit of candour and charity, adheres to that which, to the best of his judgment, is right, though in his opinion he should be mistaken, is, in the scriptural sense, either schismatic or heretic. Dr. G. Campbell.

Schismatic (siz-mat'ik), n. One who separates from an established church or religious faith on account of a diversity of opinions; one who partakes in a schism.

The schismatics united in a solemn league and covenant to alter the whole system of spiritual government. Swift.

Schismatically (siz-mat'ik-al-ly), adv. In a schismatical manner; by separation from a church on account of a diversity of opinions.

Schismaticalness (siz-mat'ik-al-nes), n. The state of being schismatical.

Schismatize (siz-ma-tiz), v.t. pret. schismatized; ppr. schismatizing. To commit or practise schism; to make a breach of communion in the church. Cotgrave.

Schismless (sizm'les), a. Free from schism; not affected by schism. [Rare.]

Schist (shist), n. [From Gr. schistos, divided, divisible, from schizo, to split, to cleave.] A geological term applied to rocks which have a foliated structure and split in thin irregular plates, not by regular cleavage, as in the case of clay-slate, nor in laminae, as flagstones. It is properly confined to metamorphic or crystalline rocks consisting of layers of different minerals, as gneiss, mica-schist, hornblende-schist, chlorite-schist, &c.

Schistic (shist'ik), a. Same as Schistose.

Schistose, Schistons (shist'ōs, shist'ōs), a. Having the structure of schists; composed of uneven laminae of different minerals, as gneiss, mica-schist.

Schizandra (shi-zan'dra), n. [From Gr. schizo, to cleave, and andrō, a man—the stamens are split.] A genus of plants belonging to the nat. order Magnoliaceae. S. coccinea is a handsome climbing shrub, with alternate membranous leaves, small crimson flowers, and red berries. It is a North American plant, and is found in woods in Georgia, Florida, and Carolina.

Schizandraceae (shiz-an-drā-sē-ē), n. pl. A small family of tropical eastern Asiatic and North American diclinous exogens, by some botanists regarded as a tribe of Magnoliaceae, distinguished from the true Magnoliaceae chiefly by their climbing habit, want of stipules, and unisexual flowers.

Schizanthus (shi-zan'thus), n. A genus of plants, nat. order Scrophulariaceae. The species are fine flowering annuals, having handsome violet, white, or crimson flowers and much-divided leaves. They are natives of Chili.

Schizodus (shiz'o-dus), n. An extinct genus of lamellibranchiate Mollusca, the fossil remains of which occur from the upper Silurian to the triassic rocks.

Schizopod (shiz'o-pod), n. One of the Schizopoda.

Schizopoda (shi-zop'o-da), n. pl. [Gr. schizo, to cleave, and pous, podos, a foot.] A tribe of long-tailed decapod crustaceans, the legs of which are accompanied by an external articulated branch as long as the limbs, which thus appear double in number. They are all of small size, and marine. The Myasis, or opossum-shrimp, furnishes an example.

Schisopteris (shi-zop'tēr-is), n. [Gr. schizo, to cleave, and pteris, a fern.] A fossil genus of ferns belonging to the coal-measures, so named from their deeply-cleft palmated leaves. They are supposed to have been tropical climbing plants.

Schleichera (shli-kē'ra), n. [After Schleich, a German botanist.] A genus of plants, nat. order Sapindaceae. S. trijuga, the best known (or only) species, is a tree with leaves abruptly pinnate, and small flowers disposed in spike-like racemes. It is a native of tropical Asia; in some parts of India its astringent bark, mixed with oil, is used as a remedy for the itch.

Schlich (shlik), n. [G.] Same as Slick.

Schmelze (shmet'se), n. [G.] A kind of glass prepared in Bohemia, chiefly for the purpose of receiving the red colour imparted by the oxide of gold.

Schmidella (shmi-dē'll-a), n. [In honour of C. C. Schmidel, a professor of botany at Erlangen.] A genus of shrubs, nat. order Sapindaceae. The species are trees or shrubs, usually with trifoliate leaves and racemose white flowers. The fruit of S. serrata is eaten by the natives of Coromandel, and the root is employed as a cure for diarrhoea. They are natives of the tropics, especially those of the New World.

Schnapps, Schnaps (shnap's), n. [G. schnapps, a dram.] A dram of Holland gin or other ardent spirits.

Schneiderian Membrane (shni-dēr'i-an mem'brān), n. In anat. the lining membrane of the nostrils; the pituitary membrane: so named from Schneider, who first described it.

Schonus (skē'nus), n. [From Gr. schōnos, a cord—made into cordage.] A genus of bog plants, nat. order Cyperaceae. The species have a wide geographical range. They are of grass-like habit, with the inflorescence in heads or crowded panicles. They are useful for making bands for tying up goods. S. nigricans (black bog-rush) is the only European species; it is a British plant, growing in bogs and wet moors.

Scholar (sko'lār), n. [From L. L. scholaris, O. Fr. escolier, Mod. Fr. écolier, from L. schola, a school. See SCHOOL.] 1. One who attends a school; one who learns of a teacher; one who is under the tuition of a preceptor; a pupil; a disciple.—2. A man of letters; a learned person; a man eminent for erudition; a person of high attainments in science or literature.

He was a scholar and a ripe and good one. Shak.

3. One that learns anything; as, an apt scholar in the school of vice.—4. One acquainted with books only; a bookish theorist; a pedant. [Rare.]

To spend too much time in studies is sloth; to make judgement wholly by their rules, is the humour of a scholar. Bacon.

5. An undergraduate in English universities who belongs to the foundation of a college, and receives a portion of its revenues to furnish him with the means of prosecuting his studies during the academic curriculum.

Scholarship† (sko-lar'i-ti), n. Scholarship. B. Jonson.

Scholarly (sko'lār-ly), a. Like a scholar; becoming a scholar or man of learning.

His Latin is much more scholarly than that of the generality of the monkish chroniclers of his time. Craik.

Scholarly† (sko'lār-ly), adv. In the manner of a scholar; as becomes a scholar. 'Speak scholarly and wisely.' Shak.

Scholarship (skol'ér-ship), n. 1. The character and qualities of a scholar; attainments in science or literature; erudition; learning. 'A man of my master's understanding and great scholarship, who had a book of his own in print.' Pope.—2. Education; teaching.

This place should be school and university, not needing a remove to any other house of scholarship. Milton.

3. An exhibition or maintenance for a scholar at some educational institution; foundation for the support of a student.

A scholarship not half maintains, And college rules are heavy chains. Warton.

Scholastic (skò-las'tik), a. [L. scholasticus.] 1. Pertaining to or suiting a scholar, school, or schools; like or characteristic of a scholar; as, scholastic manners; scholastic learning. 2. Pertaining to or characteristic of the schools or schoolmen of the middle ages; relating to the mediæval philosophers and divines who adopted the system of Aristotle, and spent much time on points of nice and abstract speculation.

The Aristotelian philosophy, even in the hands of the master, was like a barren tree, that conceals its want of fruit by profusion of leaves. But the scholastic ontology was much worse. What could be more trifling than disquisitions about the nature of angels, their modes of operation, their means of conversing? Hallam.

Hence—3. Characterized by excessive subtlety or needlessly minute subdivisions; pedantic; formal. 'A matter of conscience, and not a scholastic nicety.' Stillingfleet.

Scholastic (skò-las'tik), n. One who adheres to the method or subtleties of the schools or schoolmen of the middle ages.

The scholastics did not understand Aristotle, whose original writings they could not read; but his name was received with implicit faith. Hallam.

Scholastic† (skò-las'tik-al), a. Same as Scholastic. 'The most strict and scholastic sense of the word.' Barrow.

Scholastically (skò-las'tik-al-l), adv. In a scholastic manner; according to the niceties or method of the metaphysical schools of the middle ages. 'Moralists or casuists that treat scholastically of justice.' South.

Scholasticism (skò-las'ti-sizm), n. The system of philosophy taught by the schoolmen or philosophers of the middle ages. See SCHOOLMAN.

Scholast (skò'l-ast), n. [Gr. scholastês. See SCHOLUM.] One who makes scholliums; a commentator; an annotator; especially an ancient grammarian who annotated the classics. 'Quotations from Talmudists and scholasts.' Macaulay.

The title of this satyr in some ancient manuscripts was the reproach of idleness, though in others of the scholasts 'is inscribed against the luxury of the rich.' Dryden.

Scholastic (skò-l-ast'ik), a. Pertaining to a scholast or his pursuits. Swift.

Scholiazet (skò'l-az), v. i. pret. & pp. scholiazet; ppr. scholiazing. To write scholia or notes on an author's works. [Rare.]

He thinks to scholiazet upon the gospel. Milton.

Scholical† (skò'l-ik-al), a. Scholastic. Sir M. Hale.

Schollion (skò'l-li-on), n. Same as Schollum. Spenser.

Schollum (skò'l-um), n. E. pl. Scholliums skò'l-umz, L. pl. Schollia (skò'l-a). [Gr. scholion, from scholô, leisure, lucubration.] 1. A marginal note, annotation, or remark; an explanatory comment; specifically, an explanatory remark annexed to the Latin and Greek authors by the early grammarians.—2. In geom. a remark or comment upon one or more preceding propositions, tending to show their use, connection, limitations, or the manner of their application.

Scholyt (skò'li), n. A scholium. 'Without scholyt or gloss.' Hooker.

Scholyt† (skò'li), v. i. To write comments. The preacher should want a text, whereupon to scholyt.

School (skòl), n. [A. Sax. scôl, O. E. scôle, O. Fr. escole, from L. schola, from Gr. scholê, leisure, that in which leisure is employed, discussion, philosophy, a place where spare time is employed, a school.] 1. A place or house in which persons are instructed in arts, science, languages, or any species of learning; an institution for learning; an educational establishment; a school-room. In modern usage the term is applied to any place or establishment of education, as day schools, grammar schools, academies, colleges, universities, &c.; but it is generally restricted to places in which elementary instruction is imparted to the young.—2. The collective body of pupils in any place of instruction, and under the direction of one or more teachers; as, to teach a school; to have a large school.—3. One of the seminaries founded in the middle ages for teaching logic, metaphysics, and theology, and which were characterized by academical disputations and subtleties of reasoning.

Philosophy was no longer confined to the schools and to prelections. J. D. Morrell.

4. A session of an institution of instruction; exercises of instruction; school work.

How now, Sir Hugh? no school to-day? Shak.

5. A large room or hall in English universities where the examinations for degrees and honours take place.—6. The disciples or followers of a teacher; those who hold a common doctrine or accept the same teachings or principles; a sect or denomination in philosophy, theology, science, art, &c.; the system of doctrine as delivered by particular teachers; as, the Socratic school; the painters of the Italian school; the musicians of the German school.

Let no man be less confident in his faith concerning the great blessings God designs in these divine mysteries by reason of any difference in the several schools of Christians. Jer. Taylor.

7. A system or state of matters prevalent at a certain time; method or cast of thought; system of training generally.

He was a lover of the good old school, Who still become more constant as they cool. Byron.

8. Any place of discipline, improvement, instruction, or training. 'The world, . . . best school of best experience.' Milton.

Ye prim adepts in scandal's school, Who rail by precept and detract by rule. Sheridan.

—Common school, the name in the United States for a primary or elementary school, supported by a general rate.—High school, a name of rather indefinite application, denoting generally a school in which a superior education can be obtained; sometimes the chief public school in a town.—Normal school. See NORMAL.—Parochial schools, in Scotland, those schools established in the different parishes, in accordance with legislative enactments, for the purpose of furnishing a cheap education for the mass of the people. Such schools are now called public schools, and the management of them transferred from the heritors and presbytery to school-boards. In England public schools is a name of not very definite application, by which a certain number of schools are designated, such as Eton, Winchester, Westminster, Harrow, Rugby, Shrewsbury, &c. They are such as confer a classical education, are attended by a large number of boys, and are frequented by children of persons of rank and wealth.

School (skòl), v. i. 1. Relating to a school or to education; as, a school custom.—2. Pertaining to the schoolmen; scholastic; as, school divinity; a school divine.

School-ma'am (skòl'mâm), n. A schoolmistress. [New England.]

Schoolmaid (skòl'mâd), n. A girl at school. Shak.

Schoolman (skòl'man), a. A man versed in the niceties of academical disputation, or of school divinity. The schoolmen were philosophers and divines of the middle ages who adopted the principles of Aristotle, and spent much time on points of nice and abstract speculation. They were so called because they taught originally in the schools of divinity established by Charlemagne.

Unlearn'd, he knew no schoolman's subtle art. Pope.

Schoolmaster (skòl'mas-tér), n. 1. The man who presides over and teaches a school; a teacher, instructor, or preceptor of a school.

Adrian VI. was sometime schoolmaster to Charles V. Kneales.

2. One who or that which disciplines, instructs, and leads.

The law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ. Gal. iii. 24.

—The schoolmaster abroad, a phrase first used by Lord Brougham to express the general diffusion of education and of intelligence resulting from education.

Let the soldier be abroad if he will; he can do nothing in this age. There is such a person abroad—a person less imposing—in the eyes of some, perhaps, insignificant. The schoolmaster is abroad; and I trust to him, armed with his primer, against the soldier in full military array. Brougham.

Schoolmate (skòl'mât), n. One of either sex who attends the same school.

Schoolmistress (skòl'mis-tree), n. 1. The mistress of a school; a female who governs and teaches a school.—2. She who or that which teaches. 'Nature, that exact schoolmistress.' Dryden.

School-room (skòl'rôm), n. A room for teaching.

School-ship (skòl'ship), n. A ship on board of which a nautical reform school or training school is kept, in which boys are apprenticed and receive their education at state expense, and are trained for service as sailors; a training ship.

School-theology (skòl'thê-ol-o-jî), n. Scholastic divinity.

Schooner (skòn'ér), n. [It seems to have been proved beyond controversy that the name, like the vessel itself, is of American origin, being from a New England word soon, to skim or skip upon the water, to make ducks and drakes. The first vessel of the kind is said to have been built at Gloucester, Mass., by Captain Andrew Robinson, about 1713; and the name was given to it from the following circumstance:—Captain R. had constructed a vessel, which he masted and rigged in the manner that schooners now are, and on her going off the stocks into the water a bystander cried out, 'O, how she soons!' R. instantly replied, 'A sooner let her be,' and from that time this class of vessels has gone by that name. The name appears to have been originally spelled sooner, and to have been altered from an idea that the word was Dutch and derived from schoom, G. schön, beautiful. Soon may be the A. Sax. scēman, to ahun.] 1. A vessel with two masts, and her chief sails fore-and-aft sails, her mainsail and foresail being suspended by a gaff, like a sloop's mainsail, and stretched below by a boom. A fore-and-aft schooner has either all her sails fore-and-aft sails, or she may have a square-sail which can be set when required on the foremast. A top-sail schooner carries a square foretop-sail, and often likewise a topgallant-sail and royal. Some schooners have three masts, but they have no tops. No kind of sailing-vessel is swifter than the schooner; and this rig is therefore very often used for yachts. 2. A tall glass used for lager-beer or ale, and containing about double the quantity of an ordinary tumbler. [United States.]

Top-sail Schooner.

Schorist (shō'rist), n. A name formerly given to the more advanced students in German Protestant universities who made fags of the younger students. See PENNAL.

Schorl, Schorl (shorl'), n. [G. schörl, Sw. skörl, perhaps from skör, Dan. skör, brittle.] A mineral usually occurring in the sparry cavities and veins of the granitic rocks, and often found embedded in felspar and quartz. It is a prismatic, longitudinally striated mineral, of a pearly lustre and colour, brittle texture, and is capable of being rendered electric by heat or friction. Known also as Black Tourmaline.—Blue schorl, a variety of hayne. Red and titanite schorl, names of rutile. Violet schorl, axinite. White schorl, albite.—Schorl rock, an aggregate of schorl and quartz. Sir C. Lyell.

Schoriaceous (shor-l'ā'shus), a. Schorulous.

Schorlite (shor-l'it), n. Same as Pyenite.

Schorulous (shor'l'us), a. Pertaining to or containing schorl; possessing the properties of schorl.—Schorulous topaz. Same as Schorlite.

Schorly (shor'l'), a. Relating to or containing schorl.—Schorly granite, a granite consisting of schorl, quartz, felspar, and mica. Sir C. Lyell.

Schottish, Schottische (shot-tish'), n. [G. Schottische, Scottish.] A dance performed by a lady and gentleman, resembling a polka; also, the music suited for such a dance; it is 2 time.

Schrode (akröd'), n. Same as Esorod and Seroda.

Schnohint (akuch'in), n. An escutcheon; a shield; a device on a shield. Spenser.

Schweinforth-green (shwīn-furt-grēn'), n. A beautiful and velvety green, highly poisonous pigment, prepared by boiling together solutions of arsenious acid and acetate of copper; so called from Schweinforth in Bavaria, where it was first made.

Sciadopitys (si-a-dop'it-is), n. [Gr. skias, shade, a canopy, and pytis, a pine-tree.] A genus of conifers, known as the umbrella pine, introduced into our gardens from Japan, where it has been cultivated from time immemorial round the temples. The trunk rises to a height of 100 to 150 feet, and the habit is pyramidal. It is evergreen and highly ornamental.

Sciæna (si-ē'na), n. A genus of fishes, the type of the family Sciænidæ.

Sciænidæ (si-ē'ni-dē), n. pl. [Gr. skiaina, an amber, a grayling, and eidæ, resemblance.] A family of acanthopterous fishes, the type of which is the genus Sciæna. They are closely related to the Perches, but both the vomer and palatines are without teeth, the bones of the cranium and face are generally cavernous, and form a muzzle more or less protruding. Only two species are reckoned as British, the maigre and the bearded umbrina, both excellent for the table, as are many others of the family. Some members of the family possess a remarkable power of emitting sounds, as the maigre and drum-fish (which see). The Sciænidæ are divided into many genera, and are widely distributed.

Sciænurus (si-ē-nū'rus), n. [Gr. skiaina, an amber, a grayling, and oura, a tail.] A genus of fossil fishes, representing the perch and other allied forms. Its remains are very common in the London clay of the Isle of Sheppey.

Sciagraph (si-a-graf'), n. [See SCIAGRAPHY.]

The section of a building to show its inside.

Sciagraphic, Sciagraphical (si-a-graf'ik, si-a-graf'ik-al), a. Pertaining to sciagraphy.

Sciagraphically (si-a-graf'ik-al-lī), adv. In a sciagraphical manner.

Sciagraphy (si-a-gra-fi'), n. [Gr. skiagraphia—skia, a shadow, and graphō, to describe.]

1. The act or art of correctly delineating shadows in drawing; the art of sketching objects with correct shading.—2. In arch. the profile or section of a building to exhibit its interior structure; a sciagraph.—3. In astron. the art of finding the hour of the day or night by the shadows of objects, caused by the sun, moon, or stars; the art of dialling.

Sciæmachy (si-am'ak-i), n. See SCIOMACHY.

Sciætheric, Sciætherical (si-a-thē'rik, si-a-thē'rik-al), a. [Gr. skiathēras, a sun-dial, from skia, a shadow, and thēra, a catching.] Belonging to a sun-dial. Also written Sciætheric.

Sciætherically (si-a-thē'rik-al-lī), adv. In a sciætheric manner.

Sciatic (si-at'ik), n. Same as Sciatica.

Sciatic, Sciatical (si-at'ik, si-at'ik-al), a. 1. Pertaining to the hip; as, the sciatic artery or nerve.—2. Affecting the hip; as, sciatic pains.

Sciatica (si-at'ik-a), n. [L. sciatica, from Gr. ischiadikos, from ischias, a pain in the hips, from ischion, the hip.] Neuralgia of the sciatic nerve. It is one of the most obstinate forms of neuralgia, and if protracted produces emaciation of the limb affected, with weakness, and a more or less permanent flexion. It is a frequent complication of gout, but is most commonly due to exposure to wet and cold.

Sciatically (si-at'ik-al-lī), adv. With or by means of sciatica.

Science (si-ēns), n. [Fr. science, from L. scientia, knowledge, from scio, to know.]

1. Knowledge; comprehension or understanding of the truths or facts of any subject. 'Shakespeare's deep and accurate science in mental philosophy.' Coleridge.

God's presence or foresight of any action of mine, or rather his science or sight from all eternity, lays no necessity on anything to come to pass.

2. That wide field of mental activity which is concerned in the deducing of general laws or principles from observation of phenomena; truth or knowledge ascertained by observation, experiment, and induction; knowledge co-ordinated, arranged, and systematized; hence, a science is knowledge regarding any one department of mind or matter co-ordinated, arranged, and systematized; as, the science of botany, of astronomy, of metaphysics; mental science.—Applied science is a science when its laws are employed and exemplified in dealing with concrete phenomena, as opposed to pure science, as mathematics, when it treats of laws or general statements apart from particular instances. The term pure science is also applied to a science built on self-evident truths, and thus comprehends mathematical science as opposed to natural or physical science, which rests on observation and experiment.—Natural science is that branch of science which investigates the nature and properties of material objects, and the phenomena of nature. See under NATURAL.—Physical science, a term used in much the same sense as natural science, or as equivalent to physics (which see).—Moral science is that which treats of all mental phenomena, or, in a narrower sense, the same as moral philosophy or ethics.—The seven sciences of antiquity were grammar, logic, rhetoric, arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy.

Good sense, which only is the gift of Heaven, Although no science, fairly worth the seven. Pope.

Science deals with phenomena. By his faculties of perception, comparison, and generalization, man discovers the sequences, uniformities, co-relations, and differences of these phenomena, and groups them into so-called 'laws of nature.' This is the magnificent, unending work of science. Fraser's Mag.

Since all phenomena which have been sufficiently examined are found to take place with regularity, each having certain fixed conditions, positive and negative, on the occurrence of which it invariably happens, mankind have been able to ascertain . . . the conditions of the occurrence of many phenomena; and the progress of science mainly consists in ascertaining these conditions. J. S. Mill.

3. Art derived from precepts or built on principles; skill resulting from training; special, exceptional, or pre-eminent skill.

Nothing but his science, coolness, and great strength in the saddle could often have saved him from some terrible accident. Lawrence.

—The science, the art of boxing; pugilism. [Slang.]

Up to that time he had never been aware that he had the least notion of the science. Dickens.

4. † An object of study; a branch of knowledge.
